

THE PRESIDENT AND IMMIGRATION LAW REDUX
125 Yale L. J. (forthcoming 2015)

Adam B. Cox & Cristina M. Rodríguez†

In November 2014, President Obama announced his intention to dramatically reshape immigration law through administrative channels. Together with relief policies announced in 2012, his initiatives would shield over half of the population of unauthorized immigrants from removal and authorize them to work in the United States. These events have drawn renewed attention to the President's power to shape immigration law. They also have reignited longstanding controversy about whether constitutional limits exist on a central source of executive authority: the power to enforce the law.

In using the Obama relief policies to explore these dynamics, we make two central claims. First, it is futile to try to constrain the enforcement power by tying it to a search for congressional enforcement priorities. Congress has no discernible priorities when it comes to a very wide swath of enforcement activity—a reality especially true for immigration law today. The immigration code has evolved over time into a highly reticulated statute through the work of numerous Congresses and political coalitions. The modern structure of immigration law also effectively delegates vast screening authority to the President. Interlocking historical, political, and legislative developments have opened a tremendous gap between the law on the books and on the ground. Under these conditions, there can be no meaningful search for congressionally preferred screening criteria. Far from reflecting a faithful agent framework, then, immigration enforcement more closely resembles a two-principals model of policymaking—one in which the Executive can and should help construct the domain of regulation through its independent judgments about how and when to enforce the law.

Second, when exploring limits on the enforcement power, we should focus not on who benefits from enforcement discretion but on how the Executive institutionalizes its discretion. The Obama relief initiatives are innovative: they bind the exercise of prosecutorial discretion to a more rule-like decisionmaking process, constrain the judgments of line-level officials by subjecting them to centralized supervision, and render the exercise of enforcement discretion far more transparent to the public than is customary. These efforts to better organize the enforcement bureaucracy ultimately advance core rule of law values without undermining deterrence or legal compliance, as some critics have worried. Moreover, while our focus on discretion's institutionalization requires contextualized judgments that may rarely translate into clear doctrinal rules to govern the enforcement power, we believe it generally unnecessary and unwise to use constitutional law to limit the President's authority over how enforcement discretion is institutionalized.

INTRODUCTION

On November 20, 2014, President Obama announced sweeping executive reforms of immigration law.<sup>1</sup> The centerpiece of his announcement was an initiative designed to provide a measure of security to millions of unauthorized immigrants. Under it, executive branch officials would exercise discretion to defer the deportations of unauthorized immigrants who have lived for years in the United States and have U.S. citizen (or green-card holding) children. Parents who receive this “deferred action” also would be given work permits. As many as 3.6 million noncitizens may be eligible for relief under the program—a number that jumps to more than 5 million when the program for parents is combined with an earlier-announced Obama initiative for unauthorized immigrants who arrived in the United States as children.<sup>2</sup> Together, President Obama’s twin initiatives could protect nearly fifty percent of today’s unauthorized immigrant population.<sup>3</sup>

The President’s decision to defer the deportation of millions of immigrants sparked sharp debate among scholars and political figures about his authority to create such a large-scale relief program. The administration provided an unusually meaty framework for the debate by releasing an opinion, prepared by the Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) in the Department of Justice, concluding that the initiative was well within the administration’s statutory and constitutional authorities. Critics disagreed with the OLC’s conclusion, decrying President Obama’s actions as not just unwise but unconstitutional—as the latest installment in the rise of an imperial presidency. The debate quickly made its way to the federal courts, as nearly two-dozen states challenged the relief programs in a lawsuit that, as of this writing, remains pending and has resulted in the temporary injunction of the President’s plans.

<sup>3</sup> For a detailed account of the President’s initiatives, see infra notes 96-105 and accompanying text. In addition to the deferred action policies, DHS also announced a shift in enforcement priorities more generally. One study estimates that this shift, if “strictly implemented,” coupled with the deferred action programs, could result in 87% of unauthorized immigrants in the United States receiving some form of protection or relief from removal. Marc R. Rosenblum, Understanding the Potential Impact of Executive Action on Immigration Enforcement, at 2 (July 2015), <http://migrationpolicy.org/research/understanding-potential-impact-executive-action-immigration-enforcement>.

These events have drawn renewed attention to the President's power to shape the substance of immigration law through the exercise of his enforcement power. They have also reignited longstanding controversy about what, if any, limits exist on this central source of executive authority. Both of these issues were at the heart of our previous work, The President and Immigration Law.<sup>4</sup> Published in these pages six years ago, that article provided a historical account of the distribution of immigration lawmaking authority between the President and Congress. Our core claim in that piece was that a series of twentieth century developments—constitutional, historical, and institutional—had, as a functional matter, given the President tremendous power over the immigrant screening system: power to determine which immigrants would be permitted to remain in the United States, and which would be forced to leave.<sup>5</sup> We labeled this constellation of developments “de facto delegation” and argued that it constitutes one of the most important features of modern American immigration law.

Developments since we last wrote, culminating in President Obama's recent announcement, have both confirmed our earlier account and raised important new questions. While our previous work was mostly descriptive and historical, intervening developments have sharpened the legal and theoretical separation of powers questions raised by our account. Moreover, whereas in 2009 we chiefly addressed the allocation of power between the branches in immigration law, the passage of time has highlighted the importance of power allocations within the Executive Branch for understanding the on-the-ground practice of presidential immigration law. Thus, this Article seeks to move beyond our earlier arguments in two ways—by squarely confronting the legal and normative questions about the President's power over immigration policy, and by carefully unpacking the “unitary” Executive to develop better purchase on these questions and on our earlier descriptive account of the President and immigration law.

<sup>5</sup> In The President and Immigration Law, we identified three models that have defined the nature of executive power in immigration law. Each of these models finds some foundation in Supreme Court case law, but because the Court's opinions generally have been concerned with defining federal power writ large, they abstract from the institutional details of the separation of powers. See Cox & Rodríguez, supra note 4, at 460-483. We therefore turned to historical practice to understand inter-branch relations in immigration law and found that the President has derived considerable policy-making authority from three sources: (1) inherent power; (2) express delegation; and (3) de facto delegation. Id. at 483-519. With the rise of the modern administrative state, the inherent authority model has receded into history. Yet it was not supplanted by a widespread practice of express congressional delegations as has been true in some other regulatory areas (though, to be sure, formal delegations in limited areas of immigration law have also given Presidents avenues to advance their own policy objectives in a unilateral fashion). Instead, a more complex phenomenon that we labeled “de facto delegation” has enabled the President to set immigrant screening policy through enforcement judgments. For elaboration on the meaning of de facto delegation, see id. at 510-519 and infra Part I.

This Article makes two central claims about the relationship between enforcement discretion and the separation of powers, in immigration law and more generally. The first concerns the substantive limits on enforcement discretion: what (if anything) constrains executive branch choices about which immigrants will be protected through the exercise of enforcement discretion? The second concerns the institutionalization of that discretion: what (if anything) constrains executive branch choices about how to institutionalize the exercise of enforcement discretion within the bureaucracy? While we illuminate these questions by focusing on the President's relief initiatives, the questions themselves have much broader significance for separation of powers debates. Thus the question will remain pressing ones even if opponents of the President's relief initiatives emerge victorious in the pending federal courts litigation.<sup>6</sup>

With respect to our first argument, we show that efforts to constrain the President's enforcement authority with reference to "congressional enforcement priorities"—an approach taken by both defenders and critics of the President—are doomed to fail.<sup>7</sup> We recognize the appeal of this approach. By tying the exercise of enforcement discretion to inferences about congressional intent drawn directly from immigration statutes, the administration can claim to be acting as Congress's faithful agent, following the principal's wishes rather than making policy unmoored from the dictates of immigration law's elaborate statutory scheme. On this account, Congress makes the tough value judgments, not the President. He or she simply extracts those underlying value judgments from the statute through sophisticated legal analysis. The approach also provides a seemingly clear limiting principle to prevent the enforcement power from devolving into dispensation of the law—something that supporters of large-scale administrative relief had failed to provide until OLC shifted the tenor of the debate.

The trouble is that this faithful agent model obscures the role that enforcement discretion plays in our modern system of separated powers. Even outside the immigration context, it would be passing strange to argue that the myriad discretionary decisions made by law enforcement officials should always be motivated and constrained solely or even primarily by the value judgments those officials can trace to a code enacted by Congress. Moreover, this model is especially hobbled as an account of immigration law. Our historical account of the immigration separation of powers highlights the ubiquity of Presidents exercising discretionary immigration authority in ways that cannot be characterized as consistent with any identifiable congressional priorities.<sup>8</sup> That history has combined with a series of other developments—most notably the growth of the deportation regime and the size of the unauthorized population—to create the de facto delegation model of immigration policymaking. The tremendous authority wielded by the President under that model to shape our immigrant screening policies renders talk of “congressional priorities” for enforcement inapposite. We do not think it possible to coherently identify a set of congressional priorities for immigration enforcement through a careful, lawyerly exercise of inter-textual fidelity to the 300-page immigration code.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>6</sup> We discuss our views as to the likely outcome of this litigation in Parts II and IV, infra notes 113-114 and 293 and accompanying text.

<sup>7</sup> For use by supporters, see Memorandum from the Office of Legal Counsel to the Sec'y of Homeland Sec. and the Counsel to the President, The Department of Homeland Security's Authority to Prioritize Removal of Certain Aliens Unlawfully Present in the United States and to Defer Removal of Others 10 (Nov. 19, 2014), <http://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/olc/opinions/attachments/2014/11/20/2014-11-19-auth-prioritize-removal.pdf> [http://perma.cc/85Y5-N94M] [hereinafter OLC Memorandum Op.]. For use by critics, see infra notes 145-150 and accompanying text in Part II.

Far from fitting into a faithful agent framework, therefore, our modern system of presidentially driven ex post immigration screening is thus better understood as embodying a “two principals” model of immigration policymaking. One possible response to the emergence of this model would be to decry it as lawless. But that would be a mistake. We see significant value in a model of the enforcement power according to which executive priorities stand alongside congressional ones. As the history of immigration law has demonstrated, this model empowers the Executive to address the unanticipated costs and epistemic limits of ex ante congressional lawmaking, calibrate the policies enacted by Congress to changed circumstances, provoke constructive and innovative policy reforms in both branches, and guard against the perils of legislative stasis. Policy-making through enforcement may not advance these objectives all the time, and it could certainly be abused. But given the reality of de facto delegation and the benefits that flow from the President’s current role, it would be a mistake to dismiss policymaking through enforcement as lawless.

This rejection of substantive limits derived from congressional priorities notwithstanding, our second claim is that we can still meaningfully address the desirability or legality of particular regimes of enforcement discretion. As we explore in Part III, the better inquiry into the legality of President Obama’s relief programs, and the use of the enforcement power more generally, asks whether the Executive should be constitutionally prohibited from institutionalizing prosecutorial discretion in particular ways. The most important aspects of the President’s immigration initiatives have nothing to do with the substantive criteria for relief; the program’s focus on children, families, long-term residence, and clean criminal records strongly resembles the approach contained in many earlier, much less controversial guidance documents intended to channel prosecutorial discretion.<sup>10</sup> Instead, the more important innovation was to make the exercise of discretion more rule-like, more centralized, and more transparent. These features have been the focus of prominent critics, who have argued that the President has wielded prosecutorial discretion in an impermissibly “categorical” way, rather than in a valid “individualized” fashion, or that he has extended substantive “legal benefits” rather than mere forbearance to unauthorized immigrants.<sup>11</sup> Unlike the critics, however, we believe these choices constrain rather than abuse executive power.

The institutional choices embodied in the President’s initiatives thus raise issues far beyond immigration law: they concern broader debates about centralization, transparency, and bureaucratic justice. How we evaluate the choices embodied in the President’s plans, therefore, cannot be divorced entirely from one’s views on some classic debates about the theoretical and legal underpinnings of the American administrative state. In that sense, the President’s critics are correct that much more is at stake than the justice of deferring the removal of long-term residents of the United States.

At the same time, critics err in thinking that those questions can be resolved in this instance without a historically grounded understanding of the immigration separation of powers. The institutional account of immigration law that we have jointly developed over the course of the last several years ultimately helps explain exactly why the President’s immigration initiatives are both lawful and desirable. They ultimately promote important rule-of-law values such as transparency and accountability, as well as the age-old aim of treating like cases alike, at little cost (in particular, without undermining the goal of legal compliance that many fear is compromised by the President’s initiatives). Conjuring out of Article II either a constitutional prohibition on the way the President has institutionalized discretion in his recent immigration initiatives would significantly undermine these values, and for essentially no benefit. Moreover, it would entrench the authority of low-level bureaucrats against alternative judgments about how best to arrange power within the bureaucracy—even judgments by the very Congress that created the bureaucracy.

Our complementary arguments—against the congressional priorities approach and in favor of a focus on discretion’s institutionalization—ultimately show how the leading critiques of the President’s relief initiatives go wrong.<sup>12</sup> Yet our two central claims are important not only (or even primarily) because they help us properly evaluate the legality of the most important presidential immigration initiative in several decades. They also address a set of shortcomings in modern separation of powers and administrative law theory. Principal-agent models borrowed from contract theory and positive political theory have been invaluable tools for analyzing the administrative state. But those models also have serious limitations. In this Article, we illuminate one crucial area of executive power where standard principal-agent models obscure much more than they illuminate. We also show that the project of fleshing out separation of powers theory, descriptively and normatively, must occur with much more institutional and domain-specific context than is typical in contemporary constitutional scholarship. Far from an argument for immigration exceptionalism, our analysis highlights how immigration is just like multiple other domains of regulation, in that each evolves according to particular legal, practical, and political dynamics. Though we may be able to identify abstract goals that a system of separated powers should serve, how power has been and ought to be allocated among the branches to serve those goals will differ across time and setting.

This emphasis on context does not mean that the search for generalizable limiting principles or theories in separation of powers contexts is doomed. In fact, the arguments we make in Parts II and III together provide a framework, which we develop in Part IV, for thinking about limiting principles that can serve separation-of-powers values while accounting for institutional and historical context. Moreover, our defense of presidential immigration law in general, and President Obama's immigration initiatives in particular, does not amount to a conclusion that the current congressional-executive dynamics of immigration lawmaking are optimal. We conclude in Part IV, therefore, by taking seriously the second-best nature of immigration law's current regime of de facto delegation. We propose a few reforms—both modest and radical—that could both promote and discipline the role that the President currently plays in American immigration law.

I. A BRIEF HISTORY OF PRESIDENTIAL IMMIGRATION LAW

Before we can evaluate the immigration enforcement initiatives announced by President Obama and understand the scope of the contemporary enforcement power, some history is in order. This Part situates the initiatives within a century-long story of administrative innovation that produced modern American immigration law. Only with this context can we make sense of the motivations for, and legality of, the President's deportation relief programs.

We show that the Obama relief initiatives represent only the most recent examples of the executive policymaking that has been part and parcel of immigration history. The President has always been an immigration policymaker alongside and sometimes in competition with Congress. President Obama's recent actions simply reinforce the ways in which the content and scope of the President's regulatory authority have evolved in response to the actions of Congress, as well as underlying historical events. That evolution has been complex, involving a combination of partisan politics, external events, social movement pressures, and institutional demands. This specificity of context, however, does not turn our account into a tyranny of particularism, however. The trajectory we trace provides important, generalizable lessons that, as we will show in Parts II and III, have direct implications for how we can judge the legality and desirability of the President's relief initiatives and the use of the enforcement power more generally.<sup>13</sup>

These lessons ultimately differ considerably from the ones that some supporters of the President's initiatives have drawn from pieces of the history we recount below. Some commentators have argued that the initiatives are lawful because they sufficiently resemble actions by previous administrations—in particular, the use of administrative relief by Presidents Reagan and Bush during the implementation of a legalization program enacted by Congress in 1986. We neither treat this history as quasi-legal precedent, nor rely on debatable notions of congressional acquiescence to executive branch practice to make claims about constitutional settlements between the branches. Instead, we use this history to provide a complete account of the structure of modern immigration law, identify the imperatives and temptations that attend the use of the enforcement power in light of that structure, and explain the motivations for present-day uses of that power.<sup>14</sup> Our history underscores what critics fail to understand about the nature of enforcement today, and in that sense it provides the context for a reality-based articulation of the scope of the enforcement power.

In this Part, we begin by summarizing our 2009 account of how the President historically has used the powers expressly delegated to him to advance his own policy agenda, resulting in what we term here executive unilateralism. We then turn to the

<sup>13</sup> In much of the debate over the 2014 policies, commentators have drawn a distinction between legal arguments and policy arguments. See, e.g., Muzaffar Chishti et al., As Implementation Nears, U.S. Deferred Action Programs Encounter Legal, Political Tests, MIGRATION POLICY INSTITUTE (Feb. 11, 2015) (separately analyzing political and legal opposition to the President's actions); Understanding Initial Legal Challenges to Immigration Accountability Executive Action: Long on Politics, Short on Law, AMER. IMMIGRATION COUNCIL (Jan. 2015), http://www.immigrationpolicy.org/sites/default/files/docs/understanding\_initial\_legal\_challenges\_to\_immigration\_accountability\_executive\_action-long\_on\_politics\_short\_on\_law\_final.pdf [<http://perma.cc/H5QF-ZQN2>] (characterizing legal challenges to the 2014 policies as in fact predicated on policy arguments). Defenders of the President's actions have insisted that the legal authority for DACA and DAPA is clear and that the only source of debate is whether it makes good policy sense to defer the removal of unauthorized immigrants. But there is a third line of debate, legal in nature, that defenders of the policy sometimes obscure—whether the President's use of his prosecutorial discretion in the form of the 2014 initiatives reflects a desirable or healthy form of executive decision-making. With this Article, we illuminate that terrain. It is possible to conclude that the President's actions are legal in the sense of being within his constitutional powers historically understood, but to also debate whether they embody a form of presidentialism that advances the objectives of the general separation of powers—a debate we take up throughout this Article. The answer to the latter question may be informed by whether deferring removal of millions of unauthorized immigrants is a good idea, but the two questions are not the same.

<sup>14</sup> See, e.g., Mark Noferi, When Presidents Reagan and Bush Took Bold Executive Action on Immigration, THE HILL (Oct. 2, 2014, 12:00 PM), <http://thehill.com/blogs/congress-blog/foreign-policy/219463-when-reagan-and-ghw-bush-took-bold-executive-action-on> [<http://perma.cc/H5QF-ZQN2>]; see also Lauren Gilbert, Obama's Ruby Slippers: Enforcement Discretion in the Absence of Immigration Reform, 116 W. VA. L. REV. 255 (2013).

central source of power at issue in this Article—enforcement discretion. We demonstrate how the underenforcement of certain parts of the immigration code, as in many domains, has transformed the law enacted by Congress into regulation that reflects executive branch priorities. We then elaborate on the concept of de facto delegation introduced in our earlier work and explain its relevance to current controversies. In keeping with our turn here to a study of the internal organization of the executive branch, we close by documenting the trend in recent decades toward the Executive’s centralization of its enforcement discretion. Taken together, these perspectives on executive power help make the descriptive case for the two principals model defended in Part II and provide the institutional detail required to understand what precisely is at stake with the Obama relief initiatives.

A. From Delegation to Unilateralism

In our 2009 work, we identified three models of executive authority that emerged over the course of the twentieth century: inherent presidential authority;<sup>15</sup> express delegation;<sup>16</sup> and de facto delegation.<sup>17</sup> Each model arose through institutional practice and amidst confusion in the courts about the constitutional role each branch was supposed to play in the exercise of the federal government’s immigration power. By the late twentieth century, consonant with the dramatic expansion of the delegated administrative state, the first tradition of inherent authority had receded.<sup>18</sup> But Presidents looking to mold immigration law to advance

<sup>18</sup> See id. at 474. The most prominent (and likely only explicit) example of the President claiming inherent authority over immigration policy today is his use of Deferred Enforced Departure (DED) to defer the removal of certain noncitizens from the United States. See Memorandum from President Barack Obama to the Sec’y of Homeland Sec., Deferred Enforced Departure for Liberians (Sept. 26, 2014), <http://www.whitehouse.gov/the-press-office/2014/09/26/presidential-memorandum-deferred-enforced-departure-liberians> [http://perma.cc/3RCD-9P8Y] (extending President Bush’s 2007 grant of deferred enforced departure to Liberians “[p]ursuant to my constitutional authority to conduct the foreign relations of the United States”); Adjudicator’s Field Manual, § 38.2: Deferred Enforced Departure, U.S. CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGR. SERVICES, <http://www.uscis.gov/ilink/docView/AFM/HTML/AFM/0-0-0-1/0-0-0-16606/0-0-0-16764.html> [http://perma.cc/JK68-927C]. Citing inherent Article II authorities, Presidents since at least George H.W. Bush have halted the removal of nationals to their countries of origins where doing so would have foreign policy implications. DED has been exercised in a very limited fashion, but the President’s turn in these discrete cases to inherent foreign affairs powers as justification presents a puzzle. On the one hand, it may be that the existence of the Temporary Protected Status (TPS) statute, 8 U.S.C. § 1254a (2012), enacted in 1990 to enable the executive to defer removal of nationals from states coping with environmental calamities or civil strife, requires the President to resort to extra-statutory sources to provide relief for groups who do not fall within the TPS criteria. But it is not altogether clear why the groups given relief pursuant to DED could not have their removal deferred under the theories of prosecutorial discretion advanced to support DAPA and DACA. In other words, why must DED even exist?

their own objectives have rarely needed to resort to claims of inherent constitutional authority. Instead, they have used authorities expressly delegated to them by Congress, or taken advantage of their role in enforcing congressional schemes (the source of de facto delegation) to advance their own agendas.

Throughout the twentieth century, and up to the present, the President has used powers expressly delegated to him by Congress to advance his own immigration agenda. Importantly, these uses have often been innovative, accomplishing objectives Congress almost certainly did not intend, expanding or repurposing Congress's original design. Congress has at different moments both resisted and accommodated these efforts, in some moments moving to limit the originally delegated power in an effort to rein in executive branch efforts, while at others creating new statutory frameworks to accomplish some of the Executive's objectives.

Perhaps the best twentieth-century example of this phenomenon is the President's use of the parole power. Contained within the original Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) of 1952, the parole power permits the President to exercise discretion and allow otherwise inadmissible noncitizens into the United States.<sup>19</sup> As we explained in 2009, beginning with President Eisenhower's admission of 15,000 Hungarians fleeing the Communist crackdown in their country, the power served as "the central tool of American refugee policy," enabling the President to control refugee admissions for over twenty years.<sup>20</sup> Though Congress attempted to curtail the President's use of the power by enacting a refugee preference regime in 1965, Presidents continued to wield the discretionary power that Congress intended only for "emergent, individual, and isolated situations" in order to admit large groups of noncitizens, including during refugee crises from Cuba, Haiti, and Vietnam.<sup>21</sup> A combination of settled expectations and political pressures eventually led Congress

The answer is likely that the justifications or legal frameworks for various executive policies emerge in an ad hoc fashion and in response to the particular circumstances at issue in a given case. DED evolved out of another exercise of enforcement discretion—extended voluntary departure, discussed infra notes 37-43 and accompanying text—and served the very particular foreign affairs needs to which it has been put, namely protecting groups of noncitizens based on their nationality. At the time Presidents began invoking DED, the use of "ordinary" prosecutorial discretion in the form of deferred action does not appear to have been used in a categorical fashion, see infra note 33 (discussing other "categorical" uses of deferred action), and so deferred action might not have appeared as the obvious framework through which to grant relief to the groups given DED, leading Presidents to devise a form of enforcement discretion grounded in inherent presidential authorities, hence the link to foreign affairs. The collection of enforcement powers or programs—EVD, DED, deferred action—highlights how the content of the enforcement power develops historically and iteratively, as opposed to emanating from some sort of ex ante, coherent constitutional scheme of powers.

<sup>19</sup> Today, the parole power is codified at 8 U.S.C. 1182(d)(5) and permits the President to parole otherwise inadmissible noncitizens into the country "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit."

to make those temporary admissions permanent, underlining the President's agenda-setting power.<sup>22</sup>

With the Refugee Act of 1980, Congress directly responded to the Executive-driven agenda in two ways. First, it added language to the parole provision requiring that the discretionary act serve compelling reasons in the public interest—an addition many in Congress (perhaps mistakenly) regarded as a means of “bring[ing] the admission of refugees under greater Congressional and statutory control.”<sup>23</sup> Second, and more importantly, it created a scheme for overseas refugee selection that expressly delegated power to the President to set the number of annual refugee admissions and to select the countries from where they would be accepted.<sup>24</sup> In 1990, Congress further systematized the process of admitting noncitizens fleeing disaster by creating the Temporary Protected Status (TPS) designation, which authorizes the President to permit categories of non-citizens to remain in the United States on a temporary basis, provided they meet statutory criteria defining the types of calamities Congress deemed worthy of response through protection.<sup>25</sup> The combination of these new provisions suggests that Congress sought to replace the non-transparent use of parole authority with a semi-supervised and controlled scheme of delegation that required the President to submit his recommendations to congressional committees and to consult with various agency heads in the process.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>22</sup> Cox & Rodríguez, supra note 4, at 506. Episodes such as these help explain some of the Republican resistance to the President's recent uses of deferred action. Even though deferred action is styled as temporary, its opponents believe, with reason, that its extension will create settled expectations, which when they exist on a large scale can effectively tie the hands of future administrations and perhaps even require Congress eventually to recognize the temporary status as permanent. We discuss this phenomenon of entrenchment further infra notes 275-277 and accompanying text. In our view, we think it is far more likely that the Obama relief initiatives will tie the hands of future administrations rather than force Congress to adopt a legalization program. As a result, the initiatives do present a risk of further entrenching the unauthorized population, thus threatening the creation of a permanent underclass. That said, we could describe the state of affairs pre-DACA and DAPA the same way, suggesting that the President's relief initiatives make the best of a bad situation.

<sup>25</sup> 8 U.S.C. § 1254a. TPS filled a gap in the statutory protection of noncitizens fleeing calamities. The Refugee Act's asylum provisions, and pre-existing provisions authorizing the withholding of removal, applied only to those who met the definition of refugee, which required having a fear of persecution on account of one of several recognized grounds, including political opinion, race, and religion—the classic definition of refugee. The TPS statute provided a statutory mechanism for the Executive to protect persons fleeing disaster and civil strife. See Bill Frelick & Barbara Kohnen, Filling the Gap: Temporary Protected Status, 8 J. REFUGEE STUD. 339 (1995).

<sup>26</sup> Cox & Rodríguez, supra note 4, at 539. The statutory scheme requires the President's “appropriate consultation” with Cabinet members and members of congressional committees in determining that refugee admissions are justified and in setting admissions numbers. INA §§ 207(a)(3)-(e), 8 U.S.C. §§ 1157(a)(3)-(e); see also Stephen H. Legomsky, The Making of United States Refugee Policy: Separation of Powers in the Post-Cold War Era, 70 WASH. L. REV. 675, 697 (1995) (characterizing § 1157(e) as requiring “personal discussion”).

As we will explain later, the substitution of delegated and visible authority for discretionary and opaque authority is often a salutary development. But here, it is important to see how the President made these supposed new constraints on his authority his own. A common critique of the President's implementation in the 1980s and 1990s of the refugee selection system, for example, was that admissions during that period skewed toward nationals of then-Communist regimes, suggesting that the President used the system in order to advance his particularistic foreign policy goals rather than the more universal humanitarian objectives of the 1980 Act. This critique simultaneously assumes that the two goals are mutually exclusive and that Congress had a clear purpose it thought should drive refugee selection.

Whether either of these claims has merit is beside the point for our purposes. Instead, what matters is that the President utilized his delegated authority to serve a decidedly executive agenda. The creation of the refugee selection process in 1980 and TPS authority in 1990 may have diminished the need for sweeping and categorical use of the parole power, as well as the political and legal flexibility of the President to rely on parole as he had in the past. But these effects have been more modest than one might suppose, and parole remains an important alternative route of admission for those who may not qualify for refugee status.<sup>27</sup> The authority also continues to serve as a basis for innovation. Most recently, the Obama administration has invoked parole in place—itsself an innovation on the parole power<sup>28</sup>—to provide relief for a large group of unauthorized immigrants already in the United States—relatives of members of the military. Though the application for and granting of parole continues to be framed as case-by-case, the memorandum announcing parole in place for military families clearly reflects an interest in and intent to provide relief to a favored category of unauthorized immigrants.<sup>29</sup>

This sort of creative unilateralism that we identified in our 2009 paper has arisen in other instances in which Congress has enacted statutory provisions for

<sup>28</sup> The parole provision of the INA authorizes parole for “any alien applying for admission,” INA 212(d)(5). Section 235(a)(1) of the INA, in turn, defines “applicant for admission” to include noncitizens present in the United States without having been admitted. Thus, while parole was available, prior to some 1996 changes to immigration law, only to noncitizens who had yet to enter the United States, the agency has now interpreted its parole authority to extend to immigrants who have entered the country without having been admitted. See, e.g., Memorandum from Dep’t of Justice Office of the Gen. immigration relief. The once obscure but now frequently invoked “family fairness” regulations and enforcement policies adopted by Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush during the implementation of the legalization program enacted by Congress in 1986 offer a vivid example of the Executive developing creative tools to administer and enforce statutory schemes. The legalization program included in the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA) provided a path to legal status for millions of unauthorized migrants, but it did not extend to many of the spouses and children of those immigrants. President Reagan’s Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) elected to defer the removal of many of these family members in 1987<sup>30</sup>—a deferral President Bush continued and expanded in 1990 when legislation to legalize their status stalled in Congress.<sup>31</sup> Later that year, Congress enacted a statutory legalization for the group.<sup>32</sup>

These deferrals of removal can be framed in at least one of two ways. First, we might see them as nothing more than a form of transitional relief. On this account, Presidents Reagan and Bush operated within a statutorily created legalization framework, but in the course of implementation identified inequities (and perhaps oversights) in the design of IRCA’s original program. They used their discretion to ameliorate those inequities—to prevent the removal of family members who eventually would be eligible for immigration status through their newly legalized <sup>30</sup> Memorandum from INS Commissioner Gene McNary (Feb. 2, 1990) (described in INS Reverses Family Fairness Policy, 67 Interp. Releases 153 (Feb. 5, 1990)). The Reagan administration deferred removal of minor children where all parents with whom the child was living had permanently legalized their status pursuant to ICRA. INS Announces Limited Policy on Family Unity, 64 Interp. Releases 1191 (Oct. 26, 1987). The administration also deferred removal of spouses on a case-by-case basis, where “compelling or humanitarian factors” existed. Id. When the INS continued the policy under President Bush in 1990, the agency amended the policy to include most spouses and unmarried minor children. See INS Reverses Family Fairness Policy, 67 Interp. Releases 153, 153-54 (Feb. 5, 1990) (enumerating the prerequisites for spouses and children to benefit from the family fairness policy, including admissibility as immigrants and a maximum number of criminal convictions).

<sup>31</sup> It is worth pausing for a moment in thinking about this episode to observe that the actions of Presidents Reagan and Bush arguably defy conventional understandings of how party dynamics affect immigration policy. We might not have expected Republican Presidents to extend the reach of a legislative “amnesty.” These President’s actions might be evidence of how the Republican party in particular has evolved, as well as evidence of the way in which American Presidents have often supported more open immigration policies than have their contemporaries in Congress. For a discussion of this pattern over time, see Adam B. Cox, Enforcement Redundancy and the Future of Immigration Law, 2012 S. CT. REV. 31; see also Cox & Rodriguez, supra note 4, at 484 (discussing Presidents’ repeated veto of literacy tests for immigrant screening adopted by Congress).

spouses or parents. Once debate began in Congress about new legalization legislation to reach family members left out of the initial legislation, thus obviating the need for those family members to petition through the ordinary immigration process, the actions of the Presidents truly became transitional amelioration pending congressional action.<sup>33</sup> If the statutory legalization scheme would soon encompass those family members, it would make little sense—as a matter of resources or justice—to deport large numbers of them during the period of legal transition, if it even made sense in the first place.<sup>34</sup> Far from being oppositional, the President's actions could be seen to exemplify cooperation between the Executive and Congress in the implementation of a large new initiative.

Of course, the family fairness regulations could also be seen as an act of executive defiance. On this account, Congress's intent as reflected in IRCA was to provide legal status to a precisely defined group of unauthorized immigrants. And President Reagan's actions, in particular, amounted to a kind of executive rejection of the parameters of IRCA's legalization program and a unilateral decision to protect a group that the President, but not Congress, regarded as deserving. Perhaps these very actions forced the issue onto Congress's agenda and helped secure the statutory change adopted in 1990. Such unilateralism might have made President Reagan and Bush's judgments at the time more subject to question, but this characterization would also make so-called family fairness more of an on-point precedent for the <sup>33</sup> In this sense, the "family fairness" initiatives resemble decisions by President Clinton to defer the removal of victims of domestic abuse during debate over the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act, which contained provisions that would have made them eligible for visas. They also resemble President Bush's decision to defer the removal of student visa holders who temporarily lost their enrolled student status in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. See Memorandum from Paul W. Virtue, Acting Exec. Assoc. Comm'r, INS, to INS Regional Directors, Supplemental Guidance on Battered Alien Self-Petitioning Process and Related Issues 3 (May 6, 1997), http://www.asistahelp.org/documents/resources/Virtue\_Memo\_97pdf\_53DC84D782445.pdf (explaining the process for deferred action and work authorization during the debates over VAWA); Press Release, U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, USCIS Announces Interim Relief for Foreign Students Adversely Impacted by Hurricane Katrina (Nov. 25, 2005), http://www.uscis.gov/sites/default/files/files/pressrelease/F1Student\_11\_25\_05\_PR.pdf (announcing the deferral of removal for F-1 visa holders whose enrollment was affected by Hurricane Katrina). The deferrals, while categorical, can also be characterized as transitional.

<sup>34</sup> Because those legalized by IRCA would subsequently become able to petition for the admission of their spouses and children through the already existing immigration system, deferring their removal would arguably simply facilitate the inevitable operation of the law. The fight in Congress was about whether to allow spouses and children to "skip the line," or become permanent residents without having to wait for the green card queue to run its course. See Committee on the Judiciary United States Senate, Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1985, S.-Rep. 99-132 (1985), at 16 ("It is the intent of the Committee that the families of legalized aliens will obtain no special petitioning rights by virtue of the legalization. They will be required to wait in line in the same manner as immediate family members of other new resident aliens."). In IRCA, Congress initially rejected that option, but in so doing it did not expressly or even impliedly preclude the President from deferring removal of that same group of non-citizens.

Obama relief initiatives,<sup>35</sup> which are not tied to the implementation of a congressional legalization scheme, but rather emerged through the President's use of quintessentially executive authority.<sup>36</sup>

Whatever the appropriate characterization of family fairness, the episode embodies two of the characteristics of the separation of powers in immigration law we have emphasized here and in other work. First, the particular tool Presidents Reagan and Bush used to extend relief to the “ineligible spouses and children of legalized aliens”—extended voluntary departure (EVD)—was an innovation on enforcement discretion that emerged to address particular contingencies and grew in scope over time. The origins, justifications for, and evolution of EVD are somewhat obscure and poorly understood. But it appears to have developed in an ad hoc fashion in the 1960s and 1970s, as a class-based form of relief from deportation. The Executive typically, though not exclusively, directed it at nationals of particular countries, often for humanitarian reasons or because conditions in the noncitizens' home countries were dangerous or chaotic.<sup>37</sup> Certain Cuban nationals permitted by Eisenhower to remain in the United States in 1960, for example, benefitted from EVD.<sup>38</sup> And though it was most often used to address foreign policy-related exigencies, Presidents came to use EVD to exert considerable authority over who could remain in the United States even when foreign policy was not at issue.<sup>39</sup>

<sup>35</sup> We think this claim of defiance would go too far, for the reasons expressed supra.

<sup>36</sup> As we discuss in Part II, the Office of Legal Counsel in the Department of Justice found the President's decision to initiate DAPA lawful in part because it concluded DAPA cohered with congressional priorities of family unity expressed in the Act. As we note there, however, this claim is not that Congress delegated authority to the President to initiate DACA and DAPA. Rather, it is a claim that, in the enforcement of the INA, the President's DACA and DAPA programs advance a congressional priority, which implies that the exercise of enforcement discretion, to be lawful, must match up with some goals of Congress.

<sup>37</sup> Certain class-based deferrals, characterized after-the-fact as examples of EVD, were not understood at the time to be exercises of EVD, underscoring the murkiness of the sources of discretionary decision-making by the President in immigration law. Sharon Stephan, Cong. Research Serv., 85-599, EPW, Extended Voluntary Departure and Other Grants of Blanket Relief from Deportation 10 (1985).

<sup>38</sup> See H.R. Rep. No. 89-1978, at 2 (1966) (in August 1966, prior to the Cuban Adjustment Act, roughly 47,000 Cubans benefitted from extended voluntary departure).

<sup>39</sup> See KATE M. MANUEL & MICHAEL JOHN GARCIA, CONG. RESEARCH SERVICE, R43782, EXECUTIVE DISCRETION AS TO IMMIGRATION: LEGAL OVERVIEW 6 (2014) (listing EVD grants, at various times during the 1960s and 1970s, to those from Chile, Czechoslovakia, the Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Hungary, Romania, Iran, Nicaragua, and Uganda); Cong. Rec. 13844 (May 1, 1973) (INS associate commissioner stating that certain individuals from the Western Hemisphere with family-based visa preference would receive EVD); Oversight of INS Policies and Legal Issues: Hearing before the Subcomm. on Immigration, Citizenship, and Int'l Law of the H. Comm. on the Judiciary, 95th Cong. 86-87 (1978) [hereinafter Oversight Hearing] (statement of David Crosland, General Counsel, Immigration and Naturalization Service) (describing INS Operations Instructions in effect from 1956 to 1972 granting voluntary departure to certain highly skilled noncitizens, including foreign medical graduates).

The innovative nature of EVD extended to the legal justifications for the power: executive branch officials appear to have toggled between at least two different sources of legal authority to support its use. In 1985, officials in the Reagan administration testified that EVD stemmed from the “Executive’s constitutional authority in the areas of foreign and prosecutorial policy (supplemented by the general delegation of power over immigration in 8 U.S.C. 1103(a)).”<sup>40</sup> In 1987, however, officials claimed a more specific statutory source for the authority, contending that the power expressly delegated in the INA to grant voluntary departure (an alternative to formal removal whereby a noncitizen departs of his own volition) implied the power to grant EVD, or a temporary reprieve from removal.<sup>41</sup> Though the latter justification appears to have prevailed, probably because it points to a firmer statutory foundation than the former, it is clear that the legal authority for the practice emerged and evolved alongside (and not in advance of) the practice itself.

Second, the family fairness episode highlights the dynamic nature of the congressional-executive relationship. Executive actions like those taken by Presidents Reagan and Bush can powerfully shape the congressional agenda and the future path reform takes in the legislature. They can also, as the broader history of EVD highlights, prompt Congress to attempt to control executive discretion to advance Congress’s own policy goals. In the 1980s, for example, House and Senate subcommittees called hearings to insist that the President exercise his EVD power to defer the removal of noncitizens from El Salvador.<sup>42</sup> The appropriations process was used for a similar purpose: appropriations bills for fiscal years 1982-1983 and 1984-1985 contained statements, admittedly non-binding, that it was “the sense of the <sup>41</sup> The Reagan administration cited statutory provisions that, after changes in the immigration laws’ organization, are now codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1229c(a)(1) (providing that “[t]he Attorney General may permit an alien voluntarily to depart the United States at the alien’s own expense”). On this reading, the statute’s lack of a specific required time period for the voluntary departure confers on the Attorney General the power to grant extended voluntary departure to classes of individuals.

Congress” that Salvadorans should be granted EVD.<sup>43</sup> In other words, Congress sought to use and constrain novel forms of executive decision-making to advance the congressional agenda. These dynamics are by no means unique to immigration law, but they have been notable throughout its history.

B. Policy Making through (Under)Enforcement

A central feature of the examples of innovation discussed above is that they all emanated in some way from either express congressional delegation or in the process of implementing a discrete congressional program over which Congress gave the executive expansive implementation authority. These historical instances of executive policy making therefore differ in significant respects from the Obama relief initiatives.<sup>44</sup> The latter were formulated pursuant to the President’s determination as to how to go about enforcing the INA as a whole, not as the result of an express statutory delegation to defer the removal of certain categories of noncitizens or as part of the implementation of a larger program. To be sure, the INA expressly grants the Secretary of DHS broad authority to enforce the Code—a provision numerous defenders of the administration have cited to support the Obama relief initiatives.<sup>45</sup>

<sup>44</sup> As noted above, supporters of the administration have enthusiastically cited family fairness as precedent for the President’s actions, both because the policy emanated not from delegated authority but from the President’s enforcement power, and because of the scale of relief it provided. See Noferi, supra note 14; cf. Written Testimony of Stephen H. Legomsky, Professor, Wash. Univ. Sch. of Law, Written Testimony before the H. Comm. on the Judiciary 23-24 (Feb. 25, 2015), https://lofgren.house.gov/uploadedfiles/legomsky\_testimony.pdf. Though Congress considered and rejected the inclusion of spouses and children in IRCA’s legalization program, we still think it possible to regard President Reagan and Bush’s enforcement actions as transitional, in the sense that the legalization program gave immigration status to its beneficiaries that in turn would have enabled them to petition for the admission of their spouses and children through already existing channels. DACA cannot be characterized in that fashion, given no clear existing route in the law for its beneficiaries to petition for lawful status. See infra note 99. As for the beneficiaries of DAPA, while they may be able to adjust status because of their relationships to U.S. citizens and LPRs, in many cases that adjustment would be so far in the future as to stretch thin the meaning of transition. See infra notes 147-148 and accompanying text. More important, the political context of IRCA differs dramatically from the present one. We think it at least arguable that Congress’s creation of a legalization program in 1986 licensed executive authority to engage in gap filling and other forms of ameliorative action throughout implementation. To be clear, the absence of such license in the current context does not make the Obama relief initiatives unlawful. It just makes them different from family fairness. Ultimately, however, we think these debates about the details of family fairness and its resemblance to DACA and DAPA amount to a red herring, because they obscure the larger difficulties of using history as legal precedent.

<sup>45</sup> See 8 USC § 1103; 6 U.S.C. § 202 (“The Secretary, acting through the Under Secretary for Border and Transportation Security, shall be responsible for the following . . . (5) Establishing national immigration enforcement policies and priorities.”); Office of Legal Counsel Nov. 20, 2014 Memorandum, supra note [], at 3-4; Written Testimony of Stephen H. Legomsky, Professor, Wash.

But this general authority to enforce the Code cannot reasonably be characterized as an express delegation of any particular form of authority; it is instead a recognition that the Executive will need to develop policies and protocols to accomplish all that the INA does expressly delegate.

The scope for executive policymaking in law enforcement contexts is vast, as commentators have emphasized with respect to numerous domains.<sup>46</sup> Immigration law is no exception to this basic fact of the American system of separated powers. As is true in other arenas, the way the Executive exercises its enforcement discretion over time powerfully shapes the meaning and significance of the law. In enforcing the INA—a multi-faceted and complex code—the Executive must make numerous decisions, large and small, about how and when to wield its power.<sup>47</sup> In so doing, it must navigate the vagaries of ideologically diverse public and congressional opinion; the same enforcement strategy is often criticized as both feckless and draconian. In addition to addressing the basic question of how to allocate enforcement resources between the border and the interior,<sup>48</sup> the President and officials within DHS must determine the specific means to be used for each sort of enforcement. At the border, should it rely on fencing and technology as deterrents,<sup>49</sup> or apprehensions and quick returns? In the interior, should its focus be on employers who hire unauthorized workers, on identifying and removing non-citizens who have committed crimes,<sup>50</sup> or on removing unauthorized non-citizens generally? Congress sometimes sets the stage for or constrains these choices through authorization and appropriations laws,<sup>51</sup> but in the main, the complexity and breadth of the trade-offs required of the Executive transform him into a policy-maker.

<sup>47</sup> These choices sometimes but do not always track partisan lines, for Republicans and Democrats alike have reasons to support both strong and lax enforcement. For a discussion of these dynamics with reference to the enforcement of a particular statutory framework, in this case, the employer sanctions provisions, see supra notes 57-70 and accompanying text.

<sup>48</sup> Under the Obama administration, there is some evidence that enforcement resources have been shifting towards the border. For example, the number of interior removals has been falling for several years. See Rosenblum, supra note 3, at 6.

Historically, the President has exercised this power using a variety of legal tools. Prosecutorial discretion in the form of “deferred action”—the mechanism for the Obama relief initiatives—represents just one. We reserve analysis of that law enforcement tool until Part III and focus here instead on another crucial but oft-overlooked example of the President’s use of the enforcement power to advance his agenda (arguably at the expense of Congress): under-enforcement of the employer sanctions regime. The history of the Executive’s weak (some might say feckless) implementation of this major congressional initiative illuminates how the President’s constitutionally assigned role to execute the laws gives him power over the contours and significance of a statutory scheme.

Created by Congress in tandem with IRCA’s large-scale legalization program in 1986, the regime imposes both civil and criminal sanctions on employers who hire immigrants not authorized to work in the United States.<sup>52</sup> The theory behind employer sanctions was that penalizing employers who hired unauthorized workers would reduce the labor market incentive for illegal immigration. Congress also included employer sanctions to help justify legalization—as a promise that future legalizations would not be necessary because IRCA would eliminate one of the primary reasons for illegal immigration.<sup>53</sup>

From its inception, however, the employer sanctions regime has been largely ineffectual.<sup>54</sup> Its weaknesses stem in part from the statute itself and the trade-offs built into it. As the Supreme Court recognized in Arizona v. United States, IRCA reflects Congress’s efforts to balance the desire to prevent the hiring of unauthorized immigrants with the concern that overzealous prosecution could give employers incentives to discriminate against potential workers on the basis of race or national origin.<sup>55</sup> But these legislative tradeoffs form only part of the story. The Executive itself has taken much of the bite out of this signature congressional enforcement initiative. Across administrations, different combinations of partisan and ideological desires and institutional concerns have led to varying degrees of under-enforcement of the statute, leading lawmakers and scholarly commentators to doubt that IRCA has played a significant role in curbing unauthorized immigration to the United States.<sup>56</sup> This under-enforcement may reflect the Executive's desire to satisfy business or labor constituencies (to varying degrees depending on the party in office). It could also reflect the government's desire to target enforcement resources in the direction most saleable to the general public—toward safety risks and border enforcement—goals also reflected in Congress's expansion of the criminal law grounds for removal and appropriation of funds for border enforcement.<sup>57</sup>

<sup>54</sup> Data on the enforcement of employer sanctions is spotty and often relies on inconsistent methodologies. Andorra Bruno, Immigration-Related Worksite Enforcement: Performance Measures, CONG. RESEARCH SERVICES 4 (2013) (noting that assessments of worksite enforcement programs have been complicated by “data reporting problems, the existence of conflicting data” and the paucity of data before the creation of ICE). But data pertaining to different discrete periods of IRCA enforcement are suggestive of under-enforcement. See, e.g., id. at 5 (table 1) (showing low numbers of final orders and administrative fines relative to number of employers from 1999-2012).

Considered at a more granular level, it also becomes clear how each administration has calibrated its enforcement judgments under IRCA to address the particular mix of political and institutional pressures it has faced, managing the domain of enforcement according to its own policy preferences. Studies of the early years of implementation point to low levels of enforcement that declined over time, accompanied by the failure to develop strong incentives for compliance in immigrant-heavy industries.<sup>58</sup> One leading history of IRCA argues that the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations' commitments to deregulation led to INS policy focused on educating businesses rather than imposing penalties on them.<sup>59</sup>

In later years not much changed. Workplace enforcement strategies cycled between sanctioning employers on the one hand and conducting worksite raids to arrest unauthorized workers on the other. But none of these changes, either within administrations or across them, produced significant enforcement of the sanctions regime. With one limited exception, the number of investigations, warnings, and fines directed at employers all declined steadily and dramatically from around 1990 into the 2000s.<sup>60</sup> A brief uptick in enforcement occurred during the mid-1990s, following a Clinton administration directive that called for "strengthening worksite enforcement and work authorization verification . . . to better protect American workers and businesses that do not hire illegal immigrants.”<sup>61</sup> But this strengthening of enforcement dissipated within two years as the Clinton administration shifted its efforts away from both sanctions and worksite raids and toward targeting the removal of “criminal aliens.”<sup>62</sup>

This trend toward targeting non-citizens who had committed crimes continued under the George W. Bush administration, which seemed both uninterested in employer sanctions and focused on national security targets in the wake of September 11. While we know that millions of unauthorized immigrants are employed by hundreds of thousands of employers,<sup>63</sup> for years during the Bush administration, DHS fined fewer than 100 employers for violating IRCA.<sup>64</sup> For several years, both the number of investigations and fines hovered very close to zero,<sup>65</sup> suggesting the administration was doing next to nothing to enforce the statute.<sup>66</sup> Even when the administration did increase scrutiny of workplaces near the end of President Bush’s second term, the enforcement that resulted took the form of a series of high-profile worksite raids that led to the arrests of hundreds of workers with only thirty administrative fines issued against employers.<sup>67</sup>

The Obama administration disavowed high-profile raids in favor of employer audits and a return to the focus on noncitizens who had committed criminal offenses.<sup>68</sup> The emphasis on audits led to increasing numbers of employer sanctions during President Obama's first term.<sup>69</sup> Yet even with the Obama administration's increased attention to employer compliance, weak enforcement of IRCA has been a perennial feature of the immigration system. This under-enforcement likely stems in part from Congress's ever-growing focus on border enforcement in the appropriations process<sup>70</sup>—an indirect means of de-prioritizing employer sanctions. But the Executive has been directly responsible for deflating the 1986 statute because it has consistently chosen to focus its enforcement strategy elsewhere, rendering a signature congressional enforcement initiative largely irrelevant to immigration policy.

The complex enforcement history of IRCA ultimately reflects a crucial feature of the enforcement power we take up in more detail in Part II—that the President (through enforcement) and Congress (through appropriations and oversight) together continue to make policy and redefine the meaning of a statutory regime long after its enactment, and as the regime unfolds in practice. This history also underscores how the President's enforcement judgments drive much of that development, constructing over time the domain of regulation. These enforcement judgments may take the scheme in practice far from the intentions of the enacting Congress, but such is the consequence of enforcement.<sup>71</sup>

C. The Rise of de Facto Delegation

In our 2009 article, we juxtaposed how Presidents have used authorities expressly delegated to them, such as the parole power, with a phenomenon we termed de facto delegation. The concept relates to the sort of ordinary enforcement discretion that requires priority setting and judgment and can lead to the under-enforcement we describe above. But the phenomenon is also more radical, because it consists of a system of executive decision-making about who is entitled to remain in the United States—a system that effectively substitutes for congressional judgment. Importantly, this delegation of de facto screening authority comes not from specific statutory enactments, but from the structure of modern immigration law as a whole.

As we explained in 2009, the phenomenon has arisen because of a profound mismatch between the law on the books and reality on the ground, which has resulted from a series of legal, political, and demographic developments that have accelerated over the last four decades.<sup>72</sup> Congress has played a central role in the rise of de facto delegation, which is why we describe it as a cousin to ordinary delegation. But in using the term “delegation,” we do not mean to suggest that Congress clearly intended at any moment in time to create a system of vast ex post executive screening. Instead, the concept describes a structural reality inherited from a series of choices over time by Congress and the Executive—choices that have created a parallel executive screening regime through which the Executive exercises its own value judgments about the scope of our immigration policy. In Part II, we consider why these developments might be welcome as opposed to lawless. But first, we further define de facto delegation.

Congress has been responsible for the rise of de facto delegation through its enactment of at least three features of the INA. First, the Code renders removable any noncitizen who enters the United States without authorization—a population that reached over twelve million at its peak in 2007 and sat at about 11.7 million in 2012.<sup>73</sup> These eleven million constitute nearly half of all noncitizens currently living in the United States.<sup>74</sup> Second, since the late 1980s, Congress has made increasing numbers of criminal offenses predicates for removal, by sweeping even minor drug crimes into the Code and expanding the definition of aggravated felonies—a term of art that initially encompassed very serious crimes such as murder and rape but has come to encompass numerous even minor offenses, including misdemeanors.<sup>75</sup> The size and complexity of the population thus eligible for removal, coupled with the fact that removal requires investigations, arrests, and charging decisions by immigration police and prosecutors, means that the Executive wields tremendous screening power and the functional authority to make judgments about the types of noncitizens who should be permitted to remain in the United States. Finally, the scope of the Executive’s discretion at the enforcement stage has only been augmented by congressional decisions to constrain the authority of immigration

<sup>72</sup> A key consequence of this mismatch has been the emergence of a large gap between formal citizenship and a sociological account of membership—a distinction even courts have recognized when assessing whether and how unauthorized immigrants constitute subjects under the Constitution. See Cristina M. Rodríguez, Immigration, Civil Rights & the Evolution of the People, 142 DAEDALUS 228, 232–35 (2013). This sociological understanding of membership helps to explain the power of de facto delegation and executive branch policymaking, which arise from the fact that a perfect world is not a world of perfect compliance with current immigration law. See infra Part III.C.2

<sup>74</sup> According to the 2010 Census, approximately 22,480,000 noncitizens reside in the United States. See American Community Survey Reports, The Foreign Born Population in the United States (May 2012), <http://www.census.gov/prod/2012pubs/acs-19.pdf>, at 2.

<sup>75</sup> See 8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(43) (2012) (defining “aggravated felony”). For an accounting of these trends and an explanation that a once narrow definition has become a “colossus,” see STEPHEN H. LEGOMSKY & CRISTINA M. RODRÍGUEZ, IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE LAW AND POLICY 597–99 (6th ed. 2015).

judges to grant relief from removal at the end of deportation proceedings.<sup>76</sup> Rather than eliminating executive discretion, these provisions have simply moved the power to provide relief to the arrest and charging phase, shifting the judgment from immigration judges to prosecutors and immigration police.<sup>77</sup>

These congressionally driven dynamics have intersected with demographic and social trends that have magnified the impact of the law, namely record levels of migration, both legal and illegal, over the last 30 years.<sup>78</sup> In particular, even though the flow of illegal immigration likely reached its peak in the 1990s or early 2000s, the effects of the era of mass migration remain entrenched and therefore in need of management by the Executive.<sup>79</sup> Executive branch enforcement judgments, therefore, also have contributed to the evolution of de facto delegation in the era of mass migration, through the sorts of enforcement trade-offs described in section B. For instance, the Executive arguably has exacerbated the problem of illegal immigration by declining to either prevent the entry of or remove in large numbers unauthorized migrants who do not pose public safety or national security risks.<sup>80</sup> Even in a world of ever-increasing resources for immigration enforcement,<sup>81</sup> the gap between law on the books and on the ground has failed to close in any meaningful way, in part because of executive policy judgments. Seen in this light, Congress's decision to shower the enforcement bureaucracy with resources has served only to further increase the Executive's capacity to shape the pool of immigrants living in the United States.

<sup>78</sup> These trends, in turn, have been the function of complex legal, economic, labor market, and social forces in the United States, Mexico, and elsewhere.

<sup>79</sup> Demographers pinpoint the peak of illegal immigration to the United States sometime in the early 2000s, though the size of the unauthorized population present in the United States has remained relatively constant in recent years, even as net migration has approached near zero as the result of factors such as the Great Recession, demographic shifts in Mexico, and U.S. enforcement policy at the border. See Jeffrey S. Passel et al., Net Migration from Mexico Falls to Zero—And Perhaps Less, PEWRESEARCHCENTER (April 23, 2012), <http://www.pewhispanic.org/2012/04/23/net-migration-from-mexico-falls-to-zero-and-perhaps-less/> [<http://perma.cc/96PZ-ZLLV>].

<sup>80</sup> See Adam B. Cox & Eric A. Posner, Delegation in Immigration Law, 79 U. CHI. L. REV. 1285 (2012) (arguing that the Executive may prefer a system of illegal immigration because it poses fewer constitutional obstacles to removal); Cristina M. Rodríguez, The Citizenship Paradox in a Transnational Age, 106 MICH. L. REV. 1111, 1123-24 (2008) (reviewing HIROSHI MOTOMURA, THE LOST STORY OF IMMIGRATION AND CITIZENSHIP IN THE UNITED STATES (2006)) (arguing that citizens and lawmakers have tolerated illegal immigration because of its economic benefits). Whether any given administration has in fact tolerated illegal immigration may be in the eye of the beholder. For immigrants' rights activists, enforcement policy in recent years has seemed to mercilessly target large numbers of unauthorized immigrants with families and ties in the United States. For enforcement enthusiasts, the presence of millions of unauthorized immigrants suggests a lack of will on the Executive's part to remove.

<sup>81</sup> See generally MEISSNER ET AL., supra note 61 (describing the build-up of federal immigration enforcement resources over the last several decades).

Even the Supreme Court has embraced the central role the President plays in structuring the modern immigration screening system. In Arizona v. United States, the Court struck down most provisions of an Arizona law designed to augment federal immigration enforcement. While many of the provisions of the Arizona statute precisely tracked the INA—statutory text one might think embodied Congress’s enforcement priorities—the Court rejected Arizona’s attempt at redundant enforcement. Under the Court’s theory of preemption, federal law consists not only of the legislature’s work, or the terms of the Code, but also of the enforcement choices the Executive makes. These choices elevate certain elements of the Code over others or reflect the Executive’s desire to emphasize “human concerns” that the Executive has come to appreciate in the course of its enforcement but that might not be embedded in the Code.<sup>82</sup> On this basis, the Court converted the ordinary exercise of prosecutorial discretion into binding federal law that preempted Arizona’s immigration initiatives.<sup>83</sup> Thus, even though the state sanctions mirrored the federal statute, they were preempted because they conflicted with the way in which federal enforcement discretion had been wielded by the Executive. Whether we think federal enforcement priorities ought to have preemptive effect—a move that could be quite disruptive to federalism in the administrative state—the Court’s move speaks powerfully to the independent role the Executive can play in the development of the very meaning of a statutory scheme.<sup>84</sup>

For our purposes here—dissecting and understanding the enforcement power—the signal feature of de facto delegation has been the priority setting it entails, which can result in profound and widespread policy effects. As we argued to 2009, “the President’s inability to set formal admissions and removal criteria has not precluded him from playing a major role in shaping screening policy.”<sup>85</sup> This ex post form of screening authority has amplified the President’s control over our immigration policy, despite the fact that (and paradoxically because) Congress has maintained a <sup>82</sup> See Arizona, 132 S. Ct. at 2499 (“Discretion in the enforcement of immigration law embraces immediate human concerns. Unauthorized workers trying to support their families, for example, likely pose less danger than alien smugglers or aliens who commit a serious crime. The equities of an individual case may turn on many factors, including whether the alien has children born in the United States, long ties to the community, or a record of distinguished military service. Some discretionary decisions involve policy choices that bear on this Nation’s international relations. . . . The foreign state may be mired in civil war, complicit in political persecution, or enduring conditions that create a real risk that the alien or his family will be harmed upon return. The dynamic nature of relations with other countries requires the Executive Branch to ensure that enforcement policies are consistent with this Nation’s foreign policy with respect to these and other realities.” (emphasis added)).

<sup>84</sup> Justice Kennedy’s conception of federal law even seems to contemplate that the enacting Congress understands the Executive Branch will make crucial choices about the reach of a statute when it creates the enforcement scheme to begin with. As we explain below, our account does not turn on ascribing specific intent to the enacting Congress(es). See infra text accompanying notes 132–141.

virtual monopoly over ex ante screening. Congress, perhaps unwittingly, has born considerable responsibility for expanding the domain of enforcement in a way that has magnified executive policymaking power, by making the INA more and more complicated and rule-bound since its adoption in 1952. As we will argue in Part II, the fact that Congress may not have contemplated or intended these effects does not render the presidential actions producing them unlawful. Instead, the rise of de facto delegation underscores how regulatory domains evolve over time through the interplay of legislative acts and discretionary enforcement choices.

D. Centralizing Enforcement Within the Executive

As we explained in 2009, there are reasons to be concerned about the increasingly outsized role enforcement policy has come to play in the formulation of immigration policy. The scale of de facto delegation in particular has given rise to a variety of good governance and rule of law concerns. As has been emphasized recently in debates about policing and criminal justice, enforcement judgments are often opaque and, for that reason, frequently resist accountability.<sup>86</sup> In addition, enforcement imperatives often empower low- and mid-level officials, especially as the size of the enforcement pool expands.<sup>87</sup> The diffusion of responsibility that results may make it more difficult to structure and control enforcement policy according to priorities established by Executive Branch leadership, let alone by Congress.

Presidential administrations are, of course, attentive to these concerns, if only because they implicate the territorial tussle between political leadership in Washington and agents in the field. Without control over the bureaucracy it can be difficult, if not impossible, for a modern administration to implement its agenda. Accordingly, the modern history of presidential immigration law is as much a story about the organization of the Executive Branch, and dynamics among actors within it, as it is an account of the relationship between the Executive and Congress. Whereas in our 2009 article we focused exclusively on the latter, here we also seek to highlight how the former should factor into our account of the enforcement power and the separation of powers.

The Obama administration, in particular, has responded to the demands engendered by de facto delegation with systemic and organizational changes, of which the 2014 relief policies are only one example. The administration's enforcement policy as a whole has become increasingly directed at regularizing and making more consistent the operation of the de facto, ex post screening system—a system executive leadership has come to believe operates randomly and overly subject to the views of low-level bureaucrats and state and local officials.<sup>88</sup> The motivations for its various regularization efforts have been simultaneously institutional and political. For a Democratic administration, the politics of immigration required both that it commit to enforcing the law but also that it respond to enforcement's perceived excesses. And from DHS's institutional point of view, agents in the field (both federal and local) had become too powerful in dictating the direction of administration policy.

The administration's centralizing and regularizing moves have been myriad, but three prior to the announcement of DACA in 2012 stand out. First, the administration's virtually unprecedented decision to file preemption lawsuits against Arizona and several other states, challenging state laws designed to buttress and even replace the federal enforcement regime, reflected a desire to re-take federal control over the immigration debate and suppress state efforts to shape both immigration policy and politics.<sup>89</sup> Second, in 2011, DHS released the so-called "Morton Memos," a pair of agency memoranda designed to regulate the use of prosecutorial discretion by line-level enforcement officials. These memos grew out of a long tradition of similar efforts in previous administrations to provide guidance to immigration enforcement officials.<sup>90</sup> But the Morton Memos reached significantly beyond their <sup>88</sup> The role of state and local officials in driving federal immigration enforcement has been a subject of extended scholarly inquiry. Studies of the 287(g) program, for example, have shown that the priorities of state and local officials involved in immigration enforcement often veer from those of federal officials, though federal agents in the field can also develop common cause with local officials, creating tension with officials in Washington. See, e.g., Randy Capps, et al., Delegation and Divergence: A Study of 287(g) State and Local Immigration Enforcement, MIGRATION POLICY INSTITUTE, <http://migrationinformation.org/sites/default/files/publications/287g-divergence.pdf> [<http://perma.cc/EB3H-B98R>]. In addition, because convictions under state law serve as predicates for removal, the federal government has been dependent on cooperation from state police to identify potentially removable non-citizens, and state and local arrests and prosecutions can determine who gets funneled into removal proceedings. See Ingrid V. Eagly, Local Immigration Prosecution: A Study of Arizona Before SB 1070, 58 U.C.L.A. L. REV. 1749 (2011) (showing how Arizona employed criminal anti-smuggling laws in ways that redefined and restructured the system of immigration enforcement); Hiroshi Motomura, The Discretion that Matters: Federal Immigration Enforcement, State and Local Arrests, and the Civil-Criminal Line, 58 U.C.L.A. L. REV. 1819 (2011) (arguing that state and local police have de facto power to set the immigration enforcement agenda through ordinary policing and that any policy that permits state and local police to act as gatekeepers can undermine federal authority).

predecessors by creating a tiered enforcement scheme. Accordingly, they were regarded in the immigration law world as more serious efforts to regularize discretion than past guidances. Finally, the Obama administration's decision to make Secure Communities (launched during the waning days of the Bush administration) the centerpiece of its enforcement strategy reflected a turn to technology to systematize enforcement against criminal offenders. The promise of Secure Communities included that it displaced the unpredictable human element of formal and informal cooperation with local police.<sup>91</sup> Even though the President, as part of his November 2014 announcement, declared an end to the program and DHS replaced it with the Priority Enforcement Program, the core centralizing, data-sharing feature remains in place and likely reflects a permanent shift in the way DHS collects the information essential to its enforcement activities.<sup>92</sup>

With these moves as prelude, the motivations for the Obama relief initiatives come into sharper focus. Two of the centralizing moves succeeded, but one resulted in limited, if any, success and required a recalibration. Federal lawsuits in Arizona and elsewhere successfully muted the state policymaking initiatives that had been accelerating prior to the litigation.<sup>93</sup> Secure Communities took center stage and

Under the program, the FBI shares with DHS the fingerprint and arrest data sent to it by state and local police. DHS then runs the data through its own database to determine if state and local police have identified a potentially removable noncitizen. ICE then determines whether to request that local officials hold the noncitizen until ICE can decide whether to take custody for removal purposes. See id. at 93-96. The 2014 replacement of Secure Communities leaves the data-sharing function in place and simply changes what the administration will do with the information it receives from the FBI and, by extension, state and local officials.

<sup>92</sup> It should be noted that this centralization is relative. Because ICE depends on information held by local and state officials to do its job, it cannot avoid interacting with those bureaucracies.

<sup>93</sup> See Arizona v. United States, 132 S. Ct. 2492 (2012). The Court struck down most of Arizona’s attempt to augment federal immigration enforcement, though it left in place the most notorious provision of the statute, which requires law enforcement officials to inquire into immigration status in certain circumstances. It remains unclear the extent to which that provision has been used, for good or for ill, and much of the political momentum behind provisions of this sort eventually accounted for the vast majority of removals from the interior, superseding both the formal 287(g) program, which was always limited in scope, and systematizing long-standing informal cooperation between local and federal officials.<sup>94</sup> But for reasons we discuss in detail in Part III, the Morton Memos did not achieve their objectives, at least to the extent they were motivated by a genuine desire to significantly curb line officer discretion to initiate the removal of unauthorized immigrants without criminal records. These institutional developments, in turn, coincided with a powerful social movement of unauthorized youth demanding recognition of their rightful place in the United States. The movement eventually made its way into the White House, while the larger campaign against deportations made a strong impression on powerful local officials in places such as California, Chicago, and New York City, who began to resist participation in federal enforcement.<sup>95</sup>

The combination of these institutional and social movement pressures, along with the imperatives of the 2012 election, created the context in which the White House announced DACA and then, a little more than a year later, DAPA. The “Obama relief initiatives,” as we call them, emerged in two phases. In June 2012, then-Secretary of Homeland Security, Janet Napolitano, announced what became known as Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA).<sup>96</sup> According to the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) memorandum accompanying the announcement, noncitizens without legal status who met certain criteria were eligible to apply for a renewable two-year period of relief from removal, as well as for the

This resistance helped prompt the administration’s change in policy and demonstrated the power of the local in cooperative ventures. As Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson wrote at the time of the program’s discontinuation:

The goal of Secure Communities was to more effectively identify and facilitate the removal of criminal aliens in the custody of state and local law enforcement agencies. But the reality is the program has attracted a great deal of criticism, is widely misunderstood, and is embroiled in litigation . . . . Governors, mayors, and state and local law enforcement officials around the country have increasingly refused to cooperate with the program . . . . The overarching goal of Secure Communities remains in my view a valid and important law enforcement objective, but a fresh start and a new program are necessary.

authorization to work in the United States.<sup>97</sup> The central feature of DACA was that it covered blameless youth with longstanding presence in the United States: unauthorized immigrants who had been brought to the United States before the age of sixteen and had resided continuously in the United States for five years.<sup>98</sup>

The administration styled relief for that group as an exercise of prosecutorial discretion—a large-scale extension of the “deferred action” immigration authorities had utilized for decades as a case management and humanitarian relief tool.<sup>99</sup> To underscore that the initiative fell within the President’s enforcement powers, the administration emphasized that DACA would not confer a lawful status on its recipients, that the adjudicators of DACA petitions in United States Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) retained discretion to deny applications of even those who satisfied the eligibility criteria, and that DHS retained the discretion to terminate the status at any time. By the end of 2014, approximately 638,897 noncitizens had been granted relief under DACA.<sup>100</sup>

In an address to the nation in November 2014, the President himself announced a second round of administrative actions designed to advance a variety of long-sought policy objectives.<sup>101</sup> The centerpiece again consisted of a large-scale deferred

<sup>99</sup> The decision to defer action, or delay or decline removal, functions like the criminal prosecutor’s choice not to pursue a case. In the immigration setting, noncitizens whose prosecutions have been deferred have historically been eligible to apply for work permits pursuant to INS and now DHS regulation and are considered to be lawfully present for certain purposes, though deferred action does not confer on them a lawful immigration status. action initiative, this time for the unauthorized parents of U.S. citizens and lawful permanent residents. Pursuant to this Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents (DAPA),<sup>102</sup> eligible noncitizens who are not otherwise enforcement priorities for the government would be permitted to apply for the deferral of their removal, as well as work authorization, for three years.<sup>103</sup> Alongside this new deferred action initiative, the administration proposed to tweak the existing DACA program, expanding eligibility and extending the relief period to three years.<sup>104</sup> Together with the announcement of DAPA, DHS Secretary Jeh Johnson also issued a memorandum identifying Department-wide guidelines intended to govern removal and detention policies and budget requests more generally. The “Johnson Memo” re-enforced the Department’s long-standing emphasis on public safety, national security risks, and border enforcement. As part of this enforcement reform, the administration also announced the reformulation of the Secure Communities program. Though DHS would continue to rely on fingerprint data collected from state and local arrests, it would change DHS’s enforcement policy from requesting that state and local police detain noncitizens for removal to, instead, requesting that police simply notify DHS that the release of a potentially removable noncitizens from local

These Obama relief policies are thus best understood as the most dramatic and politically relevant examples of a larger effort to centralize the vast enforcement authority that modern de facto delegation has given to the Executive. This centralization has entailed experimenting with different means of ensuring that political leadership within the agencies, as well as the White House, exert greater control over the structure of the immigrant screening system in order to advance the policy objectives of leadership, as well as to promote consistency and predictability in enforcement. Some aspects of this centralization have elevated decisionmaking authority within the bureaucracy—moving it from lower-level to higher level decisionmakers. Other aspects have drawn power into the bureaucracy that otherwise might lie outside it—as is true in efforts to reduce the role of state and local actors in shaping the enforcement system.

All recent administrations have reflected some centralizing tendencies, but the combination of politics and current events has made centralization efforts particularly pronounced in the Obama years. Of course, the fact that the Obama relief initiatives arose in response to these intertwined institutional and political forces does not tell us that those initiatives are lawful, nor does the fact that they fit comfortably within the tradition of executive branch policy-making that we have brought to the fore in this Part and in our 2009 work. Indeed, the propriety of any one of the forms of executive action highlighted in this Part could be debated, and the mere historical rootedness of the particular exercise of a power is not sufficient to endow it with constitutional status.<sup>106</sup>

The emergence of the relief initiatives as administration policy does, however, highlight the dynamic evolution of the content and reach of executive power. In particular, they embody recent efforts by the President and political leadership to reorganize this power. Their importance stems from what they reveal to us about the Executive Branch's internal operations and those operations' relationship to core constitutional and legal values, and not just their substantive outcomes. In Parts II and III, we turn from this historical account to critique and justification, to explain how such internal reorganization can promote transparency and accountability and thus serve the objectives of the separation of powers, even as it might deviate from congressional design and advance the Executive's own policy agenda.

II. THE SUBSTANTIVE GROUNDS OF ENFORCEMENT DISCRETION

Everyone debating the Obama relief initiatives agrees on two basic points. First, all acknowledge that executive branch officials have some discretion to decide whether and when to initiate a prosecution in an individual case. This understanding represents the paradigm case of the Anglo-American concept of “prosecutorial discretion.” Even those who insist most strongly on a constrained Executive accept this discretionary authority over charging decisions in both criminal and civil contexts.<sup>107</sup> Second, all participants agree that the President cannot decline to enforce altogether a law that is constitutional. Such an effort to “suspend” the law would amount to an abdication of his Article II obligation to “take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed.”<sup>108</sup>

But how do we distinguish the constitutional exercise of prosecutorial discretion from an impermissible abdication of President’s duty to enforce the law? Putting aside purely formal arguments about the distinction between permissible “underenforcement”<sup>109</sup> and impermissible “suspension,” which suffer from serious <sup>107</sup> The existence of this authority does not mean, of course, that such discretion is never defeasible. A group of ICE agents challenged DACA on the ground that the INA stripped agency personnel of this discretion and mandates the initiation of removal proceedings against noncitizens who are inadmissible for having entered the United States without inspection. See Complaint, Crane v. Holder, No. 3:12-CV-03247- (N.D. Tex. Aug. 23, 2012) (arguing that Congress’s use of the word “shall” in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(A), which states that “if the examining immigration officer determines that an alien seeking admission is not clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted, the alien shall be detained for a [removal] proceeding, mandates the initiation of removal proceedings). <sup>109</sup> For literature exploring the pervasiveness of and reasons for under-enforcement, as well as its potential costs, see Gerald Neuman, Anomalous Zones, 48 STAN. L. conceptual problems,<sup>110</sup> claims about how to draw this distinction typically take one of two forms. The first searches for principles that limit the substantive criteria that can serve as a basis for prosecutorial discretion. The second focuses on the way the Executive institutionalizes the criteria—that is, on how the Executive structures its decision-making to take account of substantive criteria it has defined as relevant.

Prior to President Obama’s November 2014 announcement, few commentators had taken the first tack of focusing on whether the substantive grounds of relief in the President’s potential programs were themselves unlawful.<sup>111</sup> But that changed when the Office of Legal Counsel released a legal opinion to accompany the President’s unveiling of DAPA. Before the President announced his new relief policies, the Secretary of DHS and the White House Counsel turned to OLC, proposing two deferred action programs and seeking advice as to whether they were lawful. OLC found one within the Executive’s authority and the other not.<sup>112</sup> OLC’s enforcement should be left to agencies rather than private causes of action to ensure that enforcement is governed by a unified strategy given that law cannot reasonably be enforced to its limits).

<sup>110</sup> A core conceptual challenge for formalistic approaches is the fact that enforcement decisions often require judgments about the appropriate relationships among myriad parts of a large statutory code. Immigration enforcement, for example, inevitably implicates tradeoffs across numerous INA provisions—between border and interior enforcement, between immigrants who violate our criminal laws and those who ignore provisions governing who may enter and work in the United States, between targeting immigrants themselves or third parties (like smugglers or employers) who affect the demand for migration, and so on. Whether one concludes that these choices lead to the unlawful suspension of “the law” depends on the level of generality at which one evaluates the Code. At a low level of generality—that is, with a focus on particular Code provisions—such tradeoffs can often resemble suspension, because a part of the Code (often a single provision) will end up being almost entirely unenforced. But if our frame of reference is the INA as a whole, these tradeoffs simply do not entail any failure to enforce the Code as a whole.

Recall, for example, our discussion in Part I of IRCA’s employer sanctions regime. While we know that millions of unauthorized immigrants are employed by hundreds of thousands of employers, for years during the Bush administration DHS fined fewer than 100 employers for violating IRCA. Whether one believes that those facts reflect a failure to enforce the law depends on the level of generality at which one defines “the law.” And like these earlier IRCA enforcement decisions, the implementation of the Obama relief policies ultimately will mean that fewer enforcement resources will be directed to certain parts of the Code—the provisions making deportable those who entered without inspection or overstayed the terms of their lawful entry—while more enforcement resources will be directed at other elements of the Code, primarily those that make deportable noncitizens who have committed serious crimes or pose security risks.

<sup>111</sup> In the wake of the President’s announcement of DACA, a variety of commentators concluded his actions were unlawful, but they tended to focus their arguments on the institutional form of relief. Zachary Price provided the most detailed effort along these lines, arguing that “individualized” determinations are lawful but “categorical” ones are not. Price, supra note 11, at 675 (emphasis added); see also Yoo & Delahunty, supra note 11, at 784-85 (acknowledging the President’s authority to apply equitable concerns in individual cases but contending that such authority does not extend to general, categorical rules like DACA). We explain in Part III why the distinction between “categorical” and “case-by-case” enforcement discretion cannot bear the weight that Price’s argument places on it.

opinion honed in on the President's substantive priorities, asking whether the central criteria for relief—being a parent of a US citizen—was a lawful. The answer, according to OLC, could be found by asking whether providing relieve to those parents advanced “congressional priorities” embedded in the INA.

Though OLC developed its congressional priorities approach in response to a direct question about the lawfulness of DAPA, the opinion's analytic framework transcends the details of any one scheme of enforcement discretion. In our assessment of it, then, we aim simultaneously to address the particularities of DAPA (as well as DACA) in order to help resolve the debate currently raging about these specific programs, as well as to consider the viability of a congressional priorities framework for understanding any general limits on enforcement discretion, which can take numerous forms. In other words, even if DAPA were never implemented<sup>113</sup> and DACA were invalidated as the result of final federal court judgments<sup>114</sup>—

<sup>113</sup> At the time of this writing, DAPA remains enjoined. As we discuss in more detail in Part IV, a judge in the Southern District of Texas concluded that the administration violated the Administrative Procedure Act by failing to submit DAPA—a legislative rule, in its view—to notice and comment rulemaking. In the spring and summer of 2015, the Fifth Circuit denied the United States's motion to stay the injunction and held oral arguments on the appeal of the preliminary injunction. In both settings, the Fifth Circuit telegraphed its extreme skepticism of the government's position, and it therefore seems likely that DAPA either will remain enjoined by the Fifth Circuit or be reviewed by the Supreme Court by 2016. See infra notes 293-295 and accompanying text. Even if the United States were to lose at each step of the way, it could cure the APA problem by initiating notice and comment rulemaking. Provided time remains in this administration to go through these motions, DAPA is likely eventually to come into effect. To be sure, the analysis by the Texas district court and signals from the Fifth Circuit suggest underlying constitutional discomfort with the DAPA. As we explain throughout this Article, we find the constitutional objections to DACA and DAPA to be both weak and ultimately inconsistent with the approach to enforcement discretion the Supreme Court has taken in cases such as Arizona v. United States.

<sup>114</sup> Thus far, the United States has succeeded in defending DACA against attack, though neither the arguments animating those lawsuits nor the procedural developments in them is on all fours with the Texas litigation. In another lawsuit in the Fifth Circuit, a district judge in the Northern District of Texas found that ICE agents, but not the state of Mississippi, had standing to challenge DACA, see Crane v. Napolitano, 920 F. Supp. 2d 724, 736, 738, 746 (N.D. Tex. 2013) (holding that ICE agents could not claim potential violation of their oaths of office as cognizable injury but could establish injury as the result of potential discipline they might face for not complying with DACA). The court ultimately dismissed the agents' lawsuit for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, however, see Crane v. Napolitano, No. 3:12-CV-03247-0, 2013 WL 8211660, at 3 (N.D. Tex. July 31, 2013) (concluding that the Civil Service Reform Act provides “a comprehensive and exclusive scheme for resolving federal employment disputes”), aff'd by Crane v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 244 (5th Cir. 2015). In a lawsuit brought by Sheriff Joe Arpaio in the D.C. Circuit, a district court has denied a motion for a preliminary injunction against DACA and dismissed the case for lack of Article III standing. See Arpaio v. Obama, 27 F. Supp.3d 185 (D.D.C. 2014) (noting that Arpaio has no authority to enforce the immigration laws and therefore is not injured by their underenforcement and concluding that his claim of injury stemming from the need to expend resources to address crime and other costs associated with DACA was speculative). The court also telegraphed its skepticism that Arpaio could succeed on the merits, observing that “the challenged deferred action programs continue a longstanding practice of enforcement discretion regarding the Nation's immigration laws” that has been “conferred by statute” and is therefore “consistent with, rather than contrary to, congressional policy.” Arpaio v. Obama, 27 F.

outcomes we are skeptical will come to pass—evaluating the congressional priorities approach would remain an important task.

Putting aside one puzzling aspect of OLC’s congressional priorities approach—that it elevates an ordinary argument about agency compliance with statutory obligations into a constitutional argument about the President’s Article II obligations—the basic analytic framework of the “congressional priorities” approach seems straightforward.<sup>115</sup> But its seemingly straightforward quality turns out to be an illusion. As we explain in this Part, tying executive discretion to congressional priorities cannot provide a satisfying limiting principle within immigration law because, for the vast majority of enforcement choices that must be made, there are no coherent congressional priorities to be extracted from the Code. Any inquiry into congressional priorities is thus likely to be futile, which is why the dueling accounts of those priorities supplied by OLC and its critics are both unpersuasive. Moreover, in addition to providing little interpretive guidance, the congressional priorities approach perpetuates a “faithful agent” model of law enforcement that is neither descriptively accurate nor normatively attractive. Executive branch policymaking through enforcement actually advances certain goals of our scheme of separated powers. When it comes to the exercise of the enforcement power, therefore, we should embrace what we refer to as the “two principals” model of decision-making that has emerged in practice.

A. Congressional Priorities and Faithful Agents

Though we ultimately disagree with its approach, the opinion reflects the best instincts of the Office: that significant and novel Executive Branch policies ought to be scrutinized and that such scrutiny is doubly important when the exercise of power is unlikely to be reviewed by courts and raises potential separation of powers concerns.<sup>116</sup> The independence of the Office’s judgment is also reflected in an aspect of the opinion administration detractors seem to overlook: its conclusion that one of the President's proposed initiatives was beyond his authority. Though the Office frequently advises the President that a proposed course of action would not be lawful,<sup>117</sup> such advice is rarely made public, making the release of the opinion itself a remarkable event. In ultimately taking on the task of crafting a meaningful principle to limit a highly malleable form of executive authority, OLC's actions highlight that law constrains the President's actions.

Circuit held oral arguments in May 2015, during which the panel appeared to express skepticism that Arpaio had standing. Arpaio v. Obama, Case No. 14-5325 (D.C. Cir. argued May 4, 2015).

<sup>115</sup> In his work analyzing DACA, before the President’s November 2014 announcement, Zach Price offers a heuristic that resembles this OLC approach in the way that it ties the President’s enforcement power to what Congress intends. He emphasizes that the Executive can engage in “priority setting” but not “policymaking.” See Price, supra note 11, at 761. That said, the limiting principle he devises—the categorical versus individual distinction—does not attempt to excavate substantive priorities from the INA but instead devises a sort of structural device for evaluating enforcement discretion.

Two crucial legal conclusions structure the analysis in the OLC opinion. First, the opinion rejects the idea that "resource constraints" provide a meaningful principle for limiting enforcement discretion.<sup>118</sup> Many defenders of broad deportation relief had pressed that as a limiting principle. But OLC was right to reject it; as a limiting principle, it is virtually meaningless.<sup>119</sup> The existence of resource <sup>118</sup> OLC grounds its discussion of the enforcement power and the President's Take Care duty in principles articulated by the Supreme Court in Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985), only one of which relates to agency judgments as to whether "agency resources are best spent on this violation or another [and] whether the agency has enough resources to undertake the action at all." OLC Memorandum Op. supra note 7, at 10 (citing Heckler, 470 U.S. at 831). In evaluating DAPA, in particular, OLC emphasizes that limited resources did not provide the only reason for DHS's actions. It noted, "DHS has explained that the program would also serve a particularized humanitarian interest in promoting family unity" and that this justification "appears consonant with congressional policy embodied in the INA." Id. at 26.

<sup>119</sup> For a discussion of why we think structural limiting principles are desirable, see infra note 192. In the debate over the 2014 policies, defenders of the administration position have repeatedly emphasized that the President does not have close to sufficient resources to remove all non-citizens who are removable, therefore making it necessary for him to prioritize those enforcement resources he does have. e.g., Letter from Immigration Law Professors (Nov. 25, 2014), <https://pennstatelaw.psu.edu/sites/default/files/documents/pdfs/Immigrants/executive-action-law-prof-letter.pdf> [https://perma.cc/N5QU-2GWG]. This argument is unexceptional. But prior to the OLC opinion, a number of supporters of the relief initiatives had argued further that resource constraints provided an appropriate measure and means of constraining executive discretion. The suggestion was that so long as the Executive Branch spent, in accordance with appropriations legislation, all the enforcement resources Congress had provided, the President had faithfully executed his duty to enforce the law. See, e.g., Letter from Immigration Law Professors Nov. 25, 2014, <https://pennstatelaw.psu.edu/sites/default/files/documents/pdfs/Immigrants/executive-action-law-prof-letter.pdf> [https://perma.cc/USB3-XD2P] (arguing that a serious legal question would arise only if "the Administration were to halt all immigration enforcement or . . . refuse to substantially spend the resources appropriated by Congress" and noting that the Obama administration has "fully utilized all the enforcement resources Congress has appropriated [and] enforced the immigration law at record levels through apprehensions, investigations, and detentions that have resulted in over two million removals."). Impoundment might violate Article II, and it would certainly violate statutory law, but nothing short of failure to spend appropriated resources would be unlawful. Cf. Legomsky Testimony (Feb. 25, 2015), supra note 44, at 10-11 (listing express constraints imposed by Congress and constitutional rights limitations, as well as a general requirement of reasonableness, as limiting principles but presenting resource constraints as the primary constitutional, structural limit on discretion, noting that "nothing in these new policies will prevent the President from continuing to enforce the immigration laws to the full extent that the resources of Congress has given him will constraints obviously provides a sufficient condition for the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. If the executive lacks the resources to pursue every violator of the law, she must make choices about which ones not to pursue—that much is a truism. But resource constraints are not a necessary condition for the exercise of discretion: the paradigmatic historical justifications for prosecutorial discretion have little or nothing to do with resource constraints. And even were one to reject this history and conclude that resource limits should be considered necessary, the ubiquity of resource constraints would prevent this principle from providing any meaningful constraint on the exercise of executive authority. DHS has been showered with resources and operates with a budget larger than all other federal law enforcement agencies combined. Yet DHS could ignore broad swaths of the immigration code and still spend its appropriated dollars. After all, DHS currently spends its full appropriation every year and still manages to deport only a tiny fraction of the potentially removable noncitizens living in the United States.<sup>120</sup>

Instead of looking to financial constraints, OLC concluded that a limiting principle could be supplied by “congressional priorities” embedded in the Code: these priorities constrain the substantive criteria that can lawfully serve as the basis for deportation relief.<sup>121</sup> In its opinion, the Office determined that, where the decision to grant relief tracked priorities OLC unearthed from the statute, such as keeping intact the families of citizens and lawful permanent residents, relief fell within the permissible zone of discretion.<sup>122</sup> But where OLC believed that the relief could not be tightly linked to priorities embodied in existing statutory provisions, it concluded that the executive was without legal authority to act.<sup>123</sup> The opinion surveys numerous executive branch uses of deferred action and emphasizes that Congress allow. As long as he does so, it is impossible to claim that his actions are tantamount to eliminating all limits.”).

<sup>120</sup> In 2013, for example, DHS removed almost 438,000 noncitizens. See John F. Simanski, Annual Report: Immigration Enforcement Actions: 2013, U.S. DEPT. HOMELAND SEC. (Sept. 2014), http://www.dhs.gov/sites/default/files/publications/ois\_enforcement\_ar\_2013.pdf [<http://perma.cc/9A7Z-XT44>]. The unauthorized population alone remains at approximately 11 million, and the number of removals includes many lawfully present noncitizens who otherwise violated a term of the immigration laws. The fact that the Obama administration has deported more noncitizens each year than any prior presidential administration in American history does not change the fact that it can remove only a small subset of those who are in fact removable. For a discussion of the relative removal rates across administrations, see Marc R. Rosenblum & Doris Meissner, The Deportation Dilemma: Reconciling Tough and Humane Enforcement, MIGRATION POLICY INST. (Apr. 2014), <http://www.migrationpolicy.org/research/deportation-dilemma-reconciling-tough-humane-enforcement> [<http://perma.cc/FS26-2RLB>].

<sup>121</sup> OLC op. at 24 (“[A]ny expansion of deferred action to new classes of aliens must be carefully scrutinized to ensure that it reflects consideration within the agency’s expertise, and that it does not seek to effectively rewrite the laws to match the Executive’s policy preferences, but rather operates in a manner consonant with congressional policy expressed in the statute.”).

was aware of them, seeming to use past practice as a form of precedent. But the opinion then turns to determine whether the President's new proposals building on that history in fact are "consonant with, rather than contrary to,"<sup>124</sup> priorities derived from the statute itself.<sup>125</sup> The Office ultimately determined that the decision in DAPA to provide relief to the parents of U.S. citizens and green card holders promoted congressionally articulated priorities, but that a proposed program to provide relief for the parents of DACA recipients would not have.

To our knowledge, the notion that the exercise of enforcement discretion was lawful only if consistent with congressional priorities had not yet emerged as a claim in the debate at the time OLC issued its opinion. We had not seen defended elsewhere the idea that executive priority setting ought to be informed by the Executive's own analysis of the enforcement obligations (and forms of relief) Congress thought most important. At the same time, the approach feels familiar. It aligns analysis of presidential enforcement authority with the way courts (and offices such as OLC) decide whether administrative agencies have lawfully exercised their delegated authority. This focus on consistency with congressional priorities in the context of administrative rulemaking reflects the dominant approach to administrative law, in which principal-agent models—both informal and formal—are used to conceptualize and evaluate the administrative state.<sup>126</sup> When we characterize Congress as the principal and the Executive as its agent, the obvious question becomes whether the agent is promoting his principal's goals or, instead, advancing his own. The turn to congressional priorities in the OLC memo thus reflects a larger commitment to a delegation-centric model of congressional-executive relations—call it the faithful agent model of prosecutorial discretion.

On the surface, the faithful agent model might seem to have even stronger purchase in the enforcement context than in other administrative settings. In rulemaking, Congress has expressly delegated policymaking and thus interpretive authority to the Executive; but the duty to enforce is more akin to a straightforward obligation to follow the law on the books.<sup>127</sup> Congress passes laws, the executive <sup>125</sup> Id. at 13-17, 24-25 ("[T]he proposed deferred action program would resemble in material respects the kinds of deferred action programs Congress has implicitly approved in the past, which provides some indication that the proposal is consonant not only with the interests reflected in immigration law as a general matter, but also with congressional understandings about the permissible uses of deferred action.").

<sup>126</sup> See, e.g., PATRICK BOLTON & MATHIAS DEWATRIPONT, CONTRACT THEORY (2005); DAVID EPSTEIN & SHARYN O'HALLORAN, DELEGATING POWERS: A TRANSACTION COST POLITICS APPROACH TO POLICY MAKING UNDER SEPARATED POWERS (1999); Mathew D. McCubbins, Roger G. Noll & Barry R. Weingast, Administrative Procedures as Instruments of Political Control, 3 J.L. ECON. & ORG. 243 (1987). For an overview of the historical development of these models in political contexts, see Sean Gailmard, Accountability and Principal-Agent Models, in THE OXFORD HANDBOOK OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY (Mark Bovens et al. eds., 2014).

<sup>127</sup> OLC's congressional priorities approach thus implicates debates about whether the administrative state merely implements or also interprets legislation. We do not purport to resolve or enforces them—or so the argument goes. Under this reasoning, the constitutional allocation of enforcement power to the Executive assumes that the President and the bureaucracy will enforce Congress’s policies and priorities.

Of course, elucidating those priorities will likely involve a more freewheeling, inference-based inquiry than entailed by ordinary statutory interpretation, because Congress does not typically draft statutory enforcement priorities to accompany its substantive rules.<sup>128</sup> Priorities can be gleaned from any of a statute’s provisions and not just the provisions being enforced or interpreted.<sup>129</sup> Any executive branch effort to limit its enforcement judgments based on its own understanding of the goals Congress sought to achieve with the statutory framework in question is thus likely to give the Executive Branch considerable interpretive authority.

But even with these caveats, it might remain appealing to ground enforcement judgments in an argument that they advance goals set by Congress. Under this view, enforcement judgments emanate from tough value choices made by Congress, not the President. The President simply extracts those judgments from the statute, using sophisticated legal analysis. Analytically, this approach preserves congressional supremacy in the lawmaking process. The strongest version of this model would treat the Executive as a functionary, though both OLC<sup>130</sup> and commentators<sup>131</sup> wed to the principal-agent model recognize the reality that the Executive must exercise judgment when determining how to enforce the law. They simply seek to discipline that judgment in a way that ensures Congress, not the President, remains responsible for substantive policy.

B. The Limits of Congressional Intent

The appeal of the congressional priorities approach is understandable. But we do not believe it provides an effective principle for limiting Executive Branch even address those debates here and observe only that the enforcement power at first glance is less consistent with a view that the Executive has broad interpretive authority than actions undertaken pursuant to express delegations.

<sup>128</sup> In discrete instances, Congress has articulated general enforcement guidance, usually in appropriations legislation. For a discussion of the utility and force of such guidance, see infra note 135 and accompanying text.

<sup>129</sup> In its opinion, for example, OLC focuses not on the statutory provisions that would form the basis of removal for potential relief recipients under DAPA, i.e. the provisions that make unauthorized presence a ground of removal. Instead, it draws support for its conclusion that the INA embodies family unity from various provisions that grant relief from removal under specified circumstances that are unlikely to be applicable to those who would be eligible for DAPA. See OLC Op. at 27-28. For a discussion of how this differs from purposive forms of statutory interpretation, see infra note 141 and accompanying text.

<sup>131</sup> See Price, supra note 11, at 677, 680, 697 (arguing for a framework of legislative supremacy and executive judgment and acknowledging that faithful agency does not require “robotic” interpretation but rather judgment and priority setting, rather than policymaking).

enforcement judgments in immigration law and many other domains. The congressional priorities approach fails because those priorities are a mirage.

Little meaningful congressional guidance exists about how to appropriately structure the ex post screening rules for immigration law. As we explained in Part I, the modern structure of immigration law effectively delegates vast screening authority to the President. The interlocking statutory and political developments we describe have opened up a tremendous gap between law on the books and on the ground. In a world where nearly half of all noncitizens living in the United States are formally deportable, there can be no meaningful search for the congressionally preferred screening criteria. The keys to the immigrant screening system effectively belong to the Executive, who has the authority (and some might even say obligation) to define screening criteria.<sup>132</sup> As we described earlier, administrations have wielded this authority to reshape the screening system over time, a practice the Obama administration has continued.<sup>133</sup>

In theory, of course, Congress could constrain de facto delegation by complementing its substantive statutory enactments with detailed enforcement instructions or prohibitions. In practice, Congress has rarely done this—in immigration law or any other regulatory arena. Occasionally Congress blandly obligates DHS to do something like “prioritize the identification and removal of aliens convicted of a crime by the severity of that crime,”<sup>134</sup> or to fund a particular number of beds for immigrant detention (34,000, to be exact).<sup>135</sup> But loose language of prioritization does little to constrain the Executive’s authority,<sup>136</sup> and even numerical prescriptions like the bed-space mandate only scratch the surface of the decisions the Executive must make when enforcing immigration law. Negative injunctions issued by Congress have the potential to be more powerful; prohibiting DHS from granting any immigrant deferred action, for example, would more

<sup>132</sup> For further discussion of this point, see supra Part I.C and infra notes 267-269.

<sup>133</sup> For examples of the guidances issued by various administrations to set these priorities, see supra note 105 and accompanying text. OLC acknowledges the need for administrations to prioritize, citing the observation in Heckler v. Chaney that decisions whether to enforce the law require complex judgments that involve factors “peculiarly within [the agency’s] expertise.” OLC Op. at 4 (citing Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831 (1985)). But in its search for a way to ensure that the Executive does not “rewrite” the law through enforcement, it requires that those judgments be “consonant with” congressional policy. OLC Op. at 6.

<sup>134</sup> See OLC Op. at 10 (citing Department of Homeland Security Appropriations Act, 2014, Pub. L. No. 113-76, div. F, tit. II, 128 Stat. 5, 251).

<sup>135</sup> See, e.g., Department of Homeland Security Appropriations Act of 2013, Pub. L. No. 113-6, div.D (providing that “funding made available under this heading shall maintain a level of not less than 34,000 detention beds”); see also H.R. Rep. 112-492 at 56 (directing “ICE to intensify its enforcement efforts and fully utilize these resources” rather than rely on alternatives to detention).

<sup>136</sup> For example, directing the administration to prioritize the removal of persons who have committed serious offenses provides no guidance with respect to how to address the millions of other non-citizens who are removable.

seriously constrain the President's power to structure the immigrant screening system. But these sorts of prohibitions are also rare.

In this world, it will generally be futile to search for "congressional priorities" that legally constrain executive branch decisions about which immigrants, from within the vast pool of eleven million unlawfully here, may be deprioritized for deportation, not to mention congressional views as to how such deprioritization ought to be structured. And given the absence of such priorities, efforts to invoke them ultimately only obscure the reality that executive branch officials are making important value judgments about our immigrant-screening system.

Our argument should not be confused with the claim that presidential immigration law grows out of inherent Article II authority and exists independently from Congress. To the contrary: the argument is perfectly consistent with the claim that the President's has no inherent constitutional authority over immigration policy.<sup>137</sup> In such a world, the Executive makes enforcement judgments within the domain Congress has created. Congress's statutory grounds of removal, for example, specify necessary conditions for the exercise of the enforcement power against a noncitizen, and the President cannot act outside the domain defined by those conditions. Thus, if DHS decided to start deporting immigrants who had failed to pay child support—not a ground of deportability under the INA—that decision would be unlawful.

Nor is our argument that the very idea of "congressional priorities" is incoherent in principle, or that such priorities can never be identified in practice. Ordinary interpretation often entails the search for Congress's specific intent or overarching legislative "plan."<sup>138</sup> The idea of legislative priorities (or purposes, or intent) is, in our view, crucial to the construction of any persuasive interpretive theory (though embrace by so many conservative legal scholars arguing against DAPA's lawfulness is perhaps ironic).<sup>139</sup> When a court confronts the question

<sup>137</sup> Some historical examples of the President exercising inherent authority to regulate immigration exist. As noted in Part I, for example, the President claims authority to grant Deferred Enforced Departure from Article II and his power to conduct foreign relations. See also Cox & Rodríguez, supra note 4, at 485-92 (highlighting how President Truman appeared to claim inherent executive authority in the management of the Bracero guest worker program). The reach of this inherent Article II authority is beyond the scope of this Article, as we are more concerned with the role the President plays within the domains Congress constructs, and because the inherent authority model has always been marginal in the immigration sphere and has receded over time.

<sup>138</sup> See King v. Burwell, 576 U.S. ___ (2015) (Roberts, C.J., slip op. at 21) ("A fair reading of legislation demands a fair understanding of the legislative plan. . . . If at all possible, we must interpret the Act in a way that is consistent with [that plan].").

<sup>139</sup> This is not, of course, to minimize the well-understood difficulties associated with the concept of legislative intent. For a classic treatment of the problem of collective intent, see Kenneth A. Shepsle, Congress is a They, Not an It: Legislative Intent as Oxymoron, 12 INT'L REV. L. & ECON. 239 (1992). For important work about the distinction between the enacting legislature and the current legislature, see William Eskridge, Reneging on History: Court/Congress/President Game, 79 CAL. L. REV. 613 (1991); William Eskridge & Philip Frickey, Law as Equilibrium, 108 HARV. L. REV. 26 (1994); William Eskridge, Overriding Supreme Court Statutory Interpretation Decisions, 101 YALE L.J. 331, 390-403 (1991).

whether an immigrant's criminal conviction amounts to a ground of deportability under the Code, statutory interpretation arguments grounded in legislative intent will be perfectly plausible.<sup>140</sup>

But statutory interpretation questions of this sort typically have as their focus a discrete piece of statutory text. While interpreting that text might require placing it in the context of a larger code or in relation to other statutory provisions, the inquiry will typically be much more grounded in a discrete set of legislative materials than will be in inquiry into enforcement priorities.<sup>141</sup> Because, as we have noted, legislatures are not in the habit of writing enforcement instructions that accompany the substantive rules of a code, the congressional priorities approach will almost always be unmoored from any particular text and require drawing inferences from a wide, amorphous range of statutory provisions and legislative materials. These materials are unlikely to contain much guidance. And the lack of guidance should come as no surprise, once we recognize that the pervasive failure of legislatures to write down enforcement instructions reflects the implicit delegation of those choices to the Executive.

That general challenge is only magnified in the specific context of modern American immigration law, where de facto delegation has given the Executive tremendous authority to manage the ex-post screening rules by picking deportees from among a population of immigrants who are all obviously, and incontrovertibly, deportable. That is not to say, we reiterate, that the notion of congressional intent is conceptually incoherent. It is always possible to construct fanciful examples in which enforcement judgments would clearly contradict congressional purposes. Immigration law is no different in this respect. If the President announced that no enforcement resources would be directed toward immigrants with criminal convictions, and instead all resources would go towards deporting only long-term residents who were married to Americans, we would not hesitate to conclude that such an enforcement decision is prohibited by the congressional priorities embedded in the Code, as well as appropriations law. But no President is likely to adopt such a policy. Thus, within extremely broad limits—limits that, we show below, easily sweep up programs like DACA and DAPA—the structure of modern immigration law simply leaves us with no discernable congressional enforcement priorities.

<sup>140</sup> Take, for example, the term of art “aggravated felony.” Various consequences turn on whether a non-citizen has been convicted of a crime that falls into this category, but whether a federal or state offense constitutes an aggravated felony is far from straightforward and has been the subject of numerous cases of statutory interpretation within the courts of appeals and at the Supreme Court. Resolving the interpretive questions at stake in those cases will for some interpreters involve inquiring into statutory purpose. For a discussion of the development of this statutory ground of removal, see LEGOMSKY & RODRIGUEZ, supra note 75, at 598-99.

<sup>141</sup> In this sense, the congressional priorities approach and our critique of it are also orthogonal to the analysis required of courts under the APA to determine whether agency action has been arbitrary or capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise “not in accordance with law.”

To see the failure of the congressional priorities approach in practice, we need look no further than OLC's efforts to extract such priorities from the INA in order to evaluate the two relief initiatives proposed by the administration.<sup>142</sup> Again, OLC ultimately determined that the INA's goal of promoting family unity justified DAPA, which provides relief to the parents of U.S. citizens and green card holders. It observed that the statute creates a path to lawful immigration status for immediate relatives of U.S. citizens without numerical limitation, and that "numerous provisions of the [INA] reflect a particular concern with uniting aliens with close relatives who have attained lawful immigration status in the United States."<sup>143</sup> But it rejected an initiative that would have provided relief from removal and work authorization for the unauthorized parents of the beneficiaries of the DACA program of 2012. The Office determined that such relief was beyond the President's authority because the INA did not reflect "comparable concern for uniting persons who lack lawful status (or prospective lawful status) in the United States with their families. . . . Extending deferred action to the parents of DACA recipients would therefore expand family-based immigration relief in a manner that deviates in important respects from the immigration system Congress has enacted and the policies that system embodies."<sup>144</sup>

In the wake of the opinion's release, critics of DAPA disagreed strongly with OLC's view about how to cash out the congressional priorities embedded in the INA.<sup>145</sup> The Code does not promote family unity in some abstract and general way,

<sup>142</sup> OLC in a sense recognizes this problem, noting: "These limits, however, are not clearly defined. The open-ended nature of the inquiry under the Take Care Clause—whether a particular exercise of discretion is 'faithful[]' to the laws enacted by Congress—does not lend itself easily to the application of set formulas or bright-line rules." OLC Op. at 5. But whereas we would abandon the effort to draw substantive limits, OLC does its best to find them.

<sup>143</sup> OLC Memorandum Op., supra note 7, at 26. OLC also noted that, even though LPRs may not directly petition for the admission of their parents, the former could become citizens and then petition for family unity. Id. at 27. The opinion also cites the provision of the INA that authorizes the AG to cancel the removal of certain aliens who have citizen or LPR relatives and to then adjust those aliens' status to permanent resident. Id. (citing 8 U.S.C. § 1229b(b)(1)). Importantly, OLC applied a sort of "lesser included" standard to evaluating the relationship of DAPA to the statute. It reasoned that, because the proposed deferred action program would provide temporary relief, it was "sharply limited in comparison to the benefits Congress has made available through statute" and therefore "would not operate to circumvent the limits Congress has placed on the availability of those benefits." Id.

<sup>144</sup> OLC Op., supra note 7, at 32. Unlike U.S. citizen children (and lawful permanent resident children who might eventually become citizens), the unauthorized youth shielded from removal by DACA cannot under existing law file petitions for their parents to be admitted as lawful permanent residents. Id.

<sup>145</sup> See, e.g., Price, supra note 106 ("[T]he constitutional architecture supports an important background norm that executive officials still must seek to effectuate statutory policies."); Margulies, President Obama's Immigration Plan: Rewriting the Law, supra note 11 (characterizing DAPA as belonging in the third category of Justice Jackson's famous framework for evaluating executive authority, or the "lowest ebb" of Executive authority in light of Congress's regulation, and concluding that the policy's "unilateral grant of these immigration benefits defies Congress's will"); see also Peter Margulies, Taking Care of Immigration Law: Presidential Stewardship, Prosecutorial Discretion, and the Separation of Powers, 94 B.U.

they argued. Instead, the Code sometimes makes immigration benefits available for family members and at other times conspicuously declines to do so.<sup>146</sup> In other words, Congress has clearly and specifically defined the limited circumstances in which it values family unity, and the circumstances of DAPA recipients is not one of them. For decades the INA has prohibited children born in the United States from immediately sponsoring their parents' entry into the United States. A U.S.-born child must turn twenty-one before she can do so—a restriction that prevents the Fourteenth Amendment's birthright citizenship rule from enabling unauthorized immigrants to acquire status quickly by having children in the United States.<sup>147</sup> But U.S.-born children are precisely the group who, under DAPA, serve as the basis of relief for their unauthorized parents. This shows, say administration critics, that OLC got things exactly backwards.<sup>148</sup> To the extent the INA expresses priorities about when family unity should be the basis of immigration benefits, it has expressly rejected the priorities reflected in DAPA.

Similar arguments have also been made that DACA is inconsistent with the INA's priorities. DACA treats early childhood arrival in the United States as the touchstone criterion for relief from deportation. But the INA nowhere privileges young arrivals in its immigrant screening rules. Moreover, Congress has repeatedly rejected the so-called DREAM Act,<sup>149</sup> which would provide a path to legalization for

L. REV. 105, 107 (2014) (evaluating DACA and concluding that it is unlawful because it is inconsistent with the INA, in which Congress “expressly provided only limited avenues for the exercise of discretion and impliedly offered room for additional discretion only on a case-by-case basis”).

<sup>146</sup> See, e.g., Martin, Concerns about a Troubling Presidential Program, supra note 11 (arguing that OLC's invocation of cancellation was “remarkably misleading” because Congress tightened the standards for cancellation in 1996 and made it available as relief only in cases in which removal would impose “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” and because Congress capped the annual number of cancellations at 4,000, making relief far from immediate).

<sup>147</sup> See Martin, Concerns about a Troubling Presidential Program, supra note 11 (“Long-standing congressional policy, clearly fixed in statute, disallows immediate relative petitions for parents until the child reaches age 21. A test looking to consonance with congressional policy . . . has to be more candid about all the elements of that policy.”); Michael W. McConnell, Why Obama's Immigration Order was Blocked, WALL ST. J. (Feb. 17, 2015), <http://www.wsj.com/articles/michael-mcconnell-why-obamas-immigration-order-was-blocked-1424219904> [<http://perma.cc/KD5L-DN5N>] (arguing that “DAPA dispensed with” the statutory requirements that “undocumented-immigrant parents of U.S. citizens . . . wait until the child turns 21, and then . . . leave the country for 10 years before applying for a change of immigration status on account of that child”).

<sup>148</sup> See Margulies, President Obama's Immigration Plan: Rewriting the Law, supra note 11 (arguing that the INA sends a “clear signal to foreign nationals: Entering the U.S. without inspection and having kids is not a ticket to lawful residence or any of the benefits that lawful residence provides” and that “[t]he OLC memo misses this clear legislative signal”).

<sup>149</sup> See David M. Herszenhorn, Senate Blocks Bill for Young Illegal Immigrants, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 18, 2010. The Development, Relief, and Education for Alien Minors (DREAM) Act is a bill that has been introduced in Congress repeatedly that would give permanent resident status to unauthorized immigrants who were brought to the United States as youth and who have attended two years of college or served in the U.S. military. For an argument that DACA implements the DREAM Act through executive fiat, see Yoo & Delahunty, supra note 11, at 787-92.

many of the young migrants covered by DACA—further evidence, critics argue, that the Code cannot be read to reflect a congressional priority to provide protection to these young migrants.<sup>150</sup>

Who has the better argument? In our view, neither side persuades. OLC's critics are correct that there is no general policy in favor of family reunification that applies consistently throughout the Code. But critics are wrong too: the mere fact that U.S. citizen children cannot file green card petitions for their parents until age 21 does not tell us that the Code prohibits their parents from being provided with some lesser form of relief from deportation. DAPA simply defers a parent's deportation; it does not provide any lawful immigration status, let alone the right of permanent residency that comes with a green card. For the same reason, critics are mistaken in thinking that the Code's inclusion of specific, limited grounds for "relief" from removal—like those contained in the Code's "Cancellation of Removal" provision—undercuts DAPA's legality. The relief provided under the cancellation provision is, again, green card status, not deferred action. If all forms of relief from removal, including deferred action, really had to be limited to the enumerated grounds of "relief" in the Code, then nearly every grant of deferred action would be unlawful—not just the

<sup>150</sup> Interestingly, the OLC opinion does not itself even make an argument that DACA is consistent with congressional priorities reflected in the INA. The opinion request asked only that the Office formally evaluate the legality of DAPA and the proposed relief program for the parents of DACA recipients. In a footnote discussing the Office's earlier oral advice regarding DACA, however, the memo suggests that OLC might have had in mind a very different rationale for DACA itself. One possibility is that blamelessness—the fact that young migrants often bear no responsibility for their unauthorized status—implicates humanitarian and constitutional values that justifies the exercise of discretion in DACA. Blamelessness connects to anti-inheritance principles reflected in the Fourteenth Amendment and other constitutional provisions. See Christopher L. Eisgruber, Birthright Citizenship and the Constitution, 72 N.Y.U. L. REV. 54, 76 (1997) (discussing the Constitution's rejection of titles of nobility); Cristina M. Rodriguez, The Citizenship Clause, Original Meaning, and the Egalitarian Unity of the Fourteenth Amendment, 11 U. PA. J. CON. L. 1363, 1365 (2009) (articulating an anti-inheritance principle and arguing that the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment "represents our constitutional reset button" by placing "all people, regardless of ancestry, on equal terms at birth, with a legal status that cannot be denied them"). It also connects to conceptions of luck egalitarianism prominent in political philosophy. See, e.g., Richard Arneson, Luck Egalitarianism—A Primer, in RESPONSIBILITY AND DISTRIBUTIVE JUSTICE 24 (Carl Knight & Zofia Stemplowska, eds., 2011); Elizabeth Anderson, What Is the Point of Equality, 109 ETHICS 287, 288 (1999) (criticizing luck egalitarian thought and arguing that the point of equality is to address oppression, not to "eliminate the impact of brute luck from human affairs"). Moreover, the idea of blamelessness played an important role in the famous immigration case Plyer v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 220-21 (1982), which struck down Texas laws restricting unauthorized children's access to the public schools. In concluding that the laws violated the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court emphasized the blamelessness of the unauthorized children for their immigration status. Cf. Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 243 (1944) (Jackson, J., dissenting) ("Now, if any fundamental assumption underlies our system, it is that guilt is personal and not inheritable."). David Martin explains the legality of DACA in these terms, emphasizing that it "covers only a small percentage of removable aliens and because it shields only those not culpable for the initial immigration law violation." President's current policies—because DHS generally extends deferred action to non-citizens who are not eligible for more robust forms of relief like cancellation.<sup>151</sup>

If we attempt to abstract from any particular statutory provision to the claim that a web of provisions—really the whole immigration Code read intra-textually—dictates the result that either OLC or its critics are correct, we are left with an all-too-familiar level-of-generality game. At some high level of generality (does the INA prioritize families?) OLC's view looks more persuasive. At some lower level of generality (does the INA endorse deferred action for the out-of-status parents of U.S. citizens and lawful permanent residents) then it looks less persuasive. But we have no way to determine which level of generality to choose, given the way the INA has accreted meaning over time. The INA, initially adopted in 1952 and amended in significant fashion many times in the decades since, consists of a long series of legislative accretions. Each addition to the Code itself reflects a complicated mix of conflicting priorities either balanced against one another by a single Congress or across Congresses. The provisions for family-based immigration benefits have, for example, evolved in complex ways over more than a century.<sup>152</sup> There is little doubt that American immigration law makes family ties more important than do the immigration systems of many other nations.<sup>153</sup> But the devil is in the details: the general principle of family unity has been defined, qualified, and cabined in numerous ways, as have the general policy goals of augmenting the U.S. labor supply and providing protection for noncitizens fleeing disasters of various sorts, for that matter. A statute like the INA—one constructing a comprehensive regulatory scheme that has evolved in dynamic fashion over time and that embodies such a high level of complexity—will often not be amenable to many common intertextualist interpretive moves. The legislative “plan” of the INA is so full of internal contradictions and complexities as to be nearly impossible to characterize as pursuing concrete “priorities” at anything other than the highest level of generality.

This problem is not unique to immigration law. Today, it is common to many regulatory arenas, and looking for congressional priorities to constrain enforcement discretion will therefore pose a more difficult problem than those typically posed by statutory interpretation. When it comes to the INA, no individual relief provision points to Congress's intent to prohibit the adoption of a particular prioritization scheme for dealing with the 11 million removable noncitizens in the U.S. Nor does the Code as a whole, read intra-textually, do so. And at bottom the reason goes back to the general theory we laid out at the top of this section: the rise of de facto delegation consolidated in the Executive the authority to make these sorts of judgments.

C. The Two Principals Model of Immigration Policymaking

At a general level, debates over the scope of executive power traffic in two competing frames of reference. The congressional priorities approach embodies a faithful agent model according to which the Executive, when fulfilling its responsibilities through rulemaking, administration, or enforcement, should always ask itself: “What would Congress do?” The President’s obligation is to reflect as nearly as possible the policy Congress would adopt, were Congress itself making the regulatory or enforcement decision. Under this framework, the Executive exercises no policymaking autonomy and refrains from making contested value judgments, even as it exercises judgment and sets priorities.<sup>154</sup>

When it comes to understanding the enforcement power, we believe this framework is mistaken as a descriptive matter and unappealing as a normative matter. Instead, we offer a contrasting account—a “two principals model”<sup>155</sup>—according to which the President possesses his own law and policymaking power. This model appears most clearly in the foreign affairs context and in debates over the extent of inherent authority the President possesses as Commander-in-Chief or as a function of Article II. It also characterizes theories of administration and statutory interpretation that capture the power of the modern executive to displace Congress as policymaker.<sup>156</sup> One of our core contributions in this Article is to elucidate how a version of the two principals model also characterizes the enforcement domain, not as a matter of inherent presidential authority, but as a function of the imperatives of the President’s Take Care obligations, which emanate from but are not wholly controlled by Congress.

In this section, we begin by reinforcing this two principals claim descriptively. We then move to establish why the Executive serves rather than undermines certain core separation of powers values when acting as a kind of second principal in the exercise of the enforcement power. But first, we should say a few words about what we mean by two principals. We do not mean to suggest that the President and Congress are substitutes. Instead, we envision the Executive as a principal because, using the tools conferred by both the Constitution and the historical development of a particular regulatory arena, the President acts as a policymaking counterpart to Congress. He does so by playing a major and independent role in constructing the domain of enforcement over time, defining who and under what circumstances the law will regulate. Moreover, to say that the Executive is a co-principal does not mean that the President himself is authorized or obligated to act as a pure unitary principal of the sort sometimes imagined in separation of powers scholarship. Enforcement power can be lodged in a variety of institutional locations within the executive branch. Part III explores this explicitly, disaggregating the Executive and considering the possibility that the policymaking potential of the enforcement power may necessitate, or at least justify, some degree of high-level political control of or supervision over priority setting.<sup>157</sup> In the remainder of this Part, however, we bracket this institutional complexity and we think about executive power in general terms.

1. Executive construction of enforcement domains

The pure faithful agent model cannot be squared with the reality of prosecutorial discretion in immigration and many other regulatory arenas. It is a descriptive impossibility. Outside the immigration context, for example, it would be strange to argue that the myriad discretionary decisions made by federal prosecutors and other law enforcement officials are motivated only by a sense of the value judgments Congress made when enacting the criminal law. To the contrary, when a prosecutor makes a plea deal, she is much more likely to describe the choices embodied in the plea in terms of an all-things-considered pragmatic calculation that is guided by oversight within her office and, ultimately, by what justice requires. Her time would not be spent scouring the criminal code to unearth some latent congressional priorities that somehow compelled the particular plea deal.<sup>158</sup> Prosecutorial discretion has long entailed executive branch officials' legal authority (and responsibility) to make difficult value judgments about the exercise of the state's coercive authority.<sup>159</sup>

<sup>157</sup> For further discussion of who should be understood as the principal within the Executive Branch, see infra notes 247-249 and accompanying text.

<sup>158</sup> In his rejection of the independent counsel statute as a gross intrusion into the President's power to control prosecutors within the executive branch, Justice Scalia offers a vivid picture of the sort of judgments prosecutors routinely make—a picture that does not square with a congressional priorities model. He writes: “Almost all investigative and prosecutorial decisions including the ultimate decision whether, after a technical violation of the law has been found, prosecution is warranted—involve the balancing of innumerable legal and practical considerations. Indeed, even political considerations (in the nonpartisan sense) must be considered, as exemplified by the recent decision of an independent counsel to subpoena the former Ambassador of Canada, producing considerable tension in our relations with that country. Another pre-eminently political decision is whether getting a conviction in a particular case is worth the disclosure of national security information that would be necessary. . . . In sum, the balancing of various legal, practical, and political considerations, none of which is absolute, is the very essence of prosecutorial discretion.” Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 708 (1988) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

<sup>159</sup> Some critics of the President's relief initiatives believe that decisions by line-level prosecutors are an inapposite comparison. Zachary Price, for example, argues that those decisions are different in

This dynamic of prosecutorial policymaking is perhaps even more vivid when we move from the retail level of the line prosecutor to the level of the agency head or the President himself. As we documented in detail in Part I, a simple principal-agent model does not accurately capture the history of immigration law and enforcement. While the nature and scope of executive power in immigration law has evolved over time in response to events and structural phenomena, as it has in other regulatory domains, an especially notable fact of immigration history is that the President has regularly acted as an independent policymaker, pursuing agendas that his corresponding Congresses may or may not have shared. In the first century of immigration law, Presidents used quintessentially executive powers—namely the negotiation of treaties—to advance their agendas, and they were able to do so because Congress had yet to occupy the field of immigration regulation with an elaborate Code.<sup>160</sup> But even in the twentieth century context of domesticated executive power, amidst the rise of immigration delegation, the President has played the independent policymaking role to at least as robust an effect, both in exercising delegated authorities and in large part through the exercise of the enforcement power in the context of de facto delegation.

Our account of IRCA, in Part I, presents a good example: the substantive legal regime that determines whether and how to regulate employers and their unauthorized workers has evolved over the last three decades through the application Executive's enforcement judgments. IRCA as a regulatory system in 2015 looks quite distinct from IRCA as a statute enacted in 1986. The combination of partisan politics and the institutional dynamics of enforcement itself (the assessment of its costs and the efficacy of different methods of enforcement, for example) have reconstructed the regulatory domain Congress created with its initial statutory enactment.

But as the evolution of IRCA highlights, the modern immigration system should not be understood to embody a simple static and uncontested shift of authority to the Executive. The story we tell in Part I and in our 2009 work highlights that this joint federal law making is not necessarily collaborative or harmonious. Rather, it consists of the branches responding to one another's regulatory choices. Presidential immigration law has precipitated a variety of responses from Congress, which has both ratified and resisted the Executive's use of his authority.<sup>161</sup> On occasion kind because they are made on an “individualized” basis, while the decision to establish DACA or DAPA involves a “categorical” judgment by high-level agency officials (or even by the President himself). See Zachary Price, Two Cheers for OLC's Opinion, supra note 106 and Price, Enforcement Discretion and Executive Duty, supra note 11, at 674. For reasons we explore in Part III, we do not believe this distinction between individual and categorical judgments can be sustained. And for reasons we explore in this Part, we believe there to be value in Executive Branch policymaking through enforcement.

Congress has responded with actual lawmaking, as in the case of refugee policy.<sup>162</sup> In other moments, Congress has wielded the power of the purse, using appropriations measures to shape executive branch conduct.<sup>163</sup>

In response to DAPA, in particular, House Republicans have sought to tie funding for the Department of Homeland Security to riders that would block implementation of the Obama relief initiatives are but the latest example of this phenomenon.<sup>164</sup> That they have not succeeded could either demonstrate the limited utility of appropriations threats, or that these Republicans were simply grandstanding, exerting a less formal form of control through politics. The congressional-executive dynamic often does not rise to the level of lawmaking. Congress's response to the President's use of his de facto delegated power frequently takes the form of political posturing, whether during election campaigns or in hearings called to bring attention to opposition among members of Congress.<sup>165</sup> But rather than think of these responses as reflecting the petulance or dissatisfaction of a principal whose agent has gone astray, we should understand them as embodying the rivalry of two principals and the friction that can result when the center of policymaking gravity moves from one to the other.

<sup>162</sup> See id. While the efforts to constrain the use of parole power might be the one (partial) exception, even these instances of responsive immigration legislation by Congress have not amounted to the sorts of congressionally imposed constraints sometimes seen in other regulatory arenas, where Congress responds to executive branch enforcement decisions by enacting statutory prohibitions, instructions, or deadlines.

<sup>163</sup> See supra note 135 and accompanying text (discussing detention bed mandate). In addition, the ever-increasing appropriation of funds for DHS generally reflect congressional efforts to shape enforcement. See Meissner et al., Immigration Enforcement in the United States supra note 57, at 2 (documenting two decades of “sizeable, sustained budget requests and appropriations made by the executive branch and Congress . . . under the leadership of both parties” and emphasizing that the U.S. government spends more on federal immigration enforcement than all other federal law enforcement agencies combined).

At the same time, congressional complaints about the President's policymaking through enforcement have transcended partisan dynamics—though the charge of fecklessness may be less frequently lobbed at Republican Presidents (despite their examples of under-enforcement) and more frequently aimed at Democrats (despite their zealous enforcement). Tellingly, however, Congress has never responded by acknowledging, much less addressing, the underlying “causes” of de facto delegation.

This two principals understanding of Executive power differs in important respects from other influential accounts of inter-branch relations. As noted in Part I, we disclaim the position that the legality of the President's actions turns on whether precise historical precedents or analogs exist. In that sense, our argument diverges from and is more radical than the view, present in some scholarship as well as executive branch practice, that congressional acquiescence over time to a particular executive branch practice is what makes it lawful.<sup>166</sup> Instead, on our account, the President effectively acts as a principal within a regulatory space that has been constructed over time, even if Congress has not acquiesced. In immigration law, that space is breathtakingly broad in part because of the rise of de facto delegation. And within that space, the President shapes immigration law by continually revising and restructuring enforcement authority.<sup>167</sup> At the same time, our account is more restrained than the one contained in the historical gloss literature. That literature concludes that practices to which Congress has acquiesced at time one become immune from congressional override—that is, constitutionally entrenched—at time two. In contrast, on our account, Congress can defeat presidential power at time two, producing a more fluid politics of congressional-executive relations over time.

This defeasibility does not mean Congress is, ultimately, the only “true” principal, or that our account can be reduced to the claim that presidential immigration law is nothing more than the product of agency “slack.”<sup>168</sup> The idea that mere agency slack is all that is at stake is misleading for the same reason that the faithful agent framework (from which the idea of slack is drawn) leads us astray.

<sup>166</sup> The argument that historical executive branch practices qualify as constitutional precedents often entails the claim that those practices reflect a legal convention that should be accorded constitutional status. The “historical gloss” literature is founded on the idea that discrete exercises of Presidential power, acquiesced in over time by Congress, become constitutional precedents that support the continued legality of that exercise of Presidential power—even in the face of new resistance from Congress. See Curtis A. Bradley & Trevor W. Morrison, Historical Gloss and the Separation of Powers, 126 HARV. L. REV. 411 (2013) (exploring the significance of congressional acquiescence and arguing that it is necessary for a practice to achieve constitutional status but also exploring the limits and dangers of identifying or claiming acquiescence). For a discussion of the difficulties of using historical practice in this way, see Alison L. LaCroix, Historical Gloss: A Primer, 126 HARV. L. REV. F. 75 (2013) (criticizing Bradley and Morrison, in particular, for failing to account for the role of courts as “gloss producers”).

<sup>167</sup> Our model also differs from the claim made in scholarly and popular accounts that robust and independent presidential action can be justified during times of polarization, when Congress fails to fulfill its own constitutional responsibilities or obstructs policymaking. See David Pozen, Self-Help and the Separation of Powers, 124 YALE L.J. 2, 7-11 (2014); Cass R. Sunstein, Partyism, 2014 U. Chi. L. Forum (arguing that in the face of partyism—or deep prejudice against members of the opposing party—vast delegations and a receptivity to the Chevron principle offer good ways to ensure ongoing problem solving by government). While we would agree that a two principals model could be especially useful in such circumstances, we also believe the model's value transcends political contexts, for reasons we explore in Section C.2. In addition, defining what constitutes obstruction seems to us a fraught enterprise.

Conceptualizing the tremendous divergence between congressional statutes and executive branch outcomes that we document in Part I as the product of slack suggests that we should find ways to control that divergence. Slack is undesirable—something one always wishes to squeeze out of the principal-agent relationship, something that we are saddled with only because principals are incapable perfectly monitoring their agents. The history of immigration law we tell, however, suggests that presidential policy making is too pervasive and autonomous to fit this model. And as we explain in section II.C.2 below, there is value in that relationship that would be quashed by an insistence that the goal of administrative law and design should be to tighten up slack. It may be the case that under the highly stylized political science model, there can only ever be one principal, but we think that model obscures the inter-branch dynamics that have existed in practice, and we believe our conceptions of those dynamics must take account of or emerge from practice.

2. Against Faithful Agents

If we have succeeded in our descriptive account of two principals, at least within the domain of immigration enforcement, the question then becomes what to think as a normative matter about the system we now have.<sup>169</sup> Our goal is not to erect a theory of separated powers from the ground up, or to identify an “optimal” separation of powers. It can be hard to avoid abstract generalities when attempting to articulate the reasons for horizontal divisions of power. The Supreme Court’s regular references to the prevention of tyranny or the protection of individual rights as the purposes of the separation of powers may ring true as far as they go,<sup>170</sup> but

---

<sup>169</sup> As should be clear from everything we have said thus far, we do not believe this normative question can be collapsed into a formalistic inquiry into whether the President’s exercise of the enforcement power ceases to be “executive” and becomes “legislative.” To be sure, there is a long intellectual tradition, dating at least to Montesquieu and Locke, advancing the idea that certain forms of power belong to certain types of government actors. For a leading but somewhat forlorn defense of this view, see Jeremy Waldron, Separation of Powers in Thought and Practice?, 54 B.C. L. REV. 433, 438, 442 (2013) (“even if the principle is dying a sclerotic death, even if it misconceives the character of modern political institutions, still it points to something that was once deemed valuable—namely, articulated governance through successive phases of governance each of which maintains its own integrity”). Modern administrative law has largely moved us past this formalistic idea of dividing power according to its type. See, e.g., M. Elizabeth Magill, Beyond Powers and Branches in Separation of Powers, 150 U. PA. L. REV. 603, 605-06 (2001) (turning attention away from constitutional separation of powers and toward consideration of how governmental power is shared by “large and diverse set of government decision-makers”). Cf. Walter Dellinger, Memorandum, The Constitutional Separation of Powers Between the President and Congress, (1996), reprinted in 63 L. & CONTEMP. PROBS. 514 (2000) (discussing cases such as Bonsher v. Synar that identify Congressional aggrandizement, or Congressional efforts to formally exert Executive powers).

<sup>170</sup> The “purpose” question is quite under-theorized in Supreme Court precedent. Much as it does in the federalism context, the Court gestures toward abstract values such as protecting liberty and preventing the rise of tyranny before it elaborates the particular power arrangements it believes the Constitution has erected to advance those values. However, the connection between the constitutional allocations and the values is typically assumed rather than analyzed. See, e.g., Stern v.

they are little more than platitudes when a genuine competition for power is at stake, in part because those power struggles do not themselves involve a clear battle between tyranny and freedom. We are deeply skeptical that a true first principles inquiry can succeed, and a central conceit of our work is that any theory of power allocation must emerge from institutional and historical context.<sup>171</sup> That is not to say that we don't think current arrangements can be improved—a task we take on in Part IV. But if we reason from abstractions rather than from practice, we will lose sight of a number of benefits that flow from the two principals model of immigration lawmaking that has emerged over time. Given the system we've inherited, it will be useful to understand its upsides.

In so doing, we focus on a second-order set of trade-offs that the separation of powers in practice entails: the classic struggle between the exercise of power to accomplish the ends of government and the overarching need to ensure that power is constrained, or exercised in a non-arbitrary fashion.<sup>172</sup> A central feature of this inquiry, for our purposes, is a debate about how best to ensure that the Executive acts in an accountable fashion, and then whether that accountability should be to apolitical norms of reasoned decision-making or to popular and political conceptions

Sawyer*, 343 U.S. 579, 635 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring) (separation of powers’ goal is to “diffus[e] power the better to secure liberty”).

<sup>171</sup> In rejecting the idea that there is some single, platonic separation of powers principle, we share much in common with John Manning, The Separation of Powers as Ordinary Interpretation, 124 HARV. L. REV. 1939 (2011) (arguing that there is no freestanding principal of the separation of powers). Of course, we differ a good deal as to the reasons for concluding that no such single principle exists, as well as on the implications that flow from its absence.

<sup>172</sup> For a discussion of this dichotomy between power and constraint, see Jon D. Michaels, An Enduring, Evolving Separation of Powers, 115 COLUM. L. REV. 515 (2015). As Michaels describes the literature and the theory, the concept of checking powers is not just about constraining abuse, it is also about legitimating the exercise of power. Id. at 513. The Supreme Court’s separation of powers jurisprudence is full of language linking both separation of powers and federalism to the related goal of diffusing power or preventing its concentration. Dep’t of Transp. v. Ass’n of Am. Railroads, 135 S. Ct. 1225, 1244-45 (2015) (Thomas, J., concurring) (depicting the Framers as “concerned not just with the starting allocation” of power but also with power’s ability to concentrate over time); *Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. of accountability.<sup>173</sup> In this sense, the inquiry sounds as much in administrative law as it does in constitutional law. In the balance of this section, we explain why the two principals model as applied to the enforcement power resonates with aspirations for constrained and accountable governmental power across the branches. We reserve for Part III a full discussion of the accountability trade-offs embodied in the Obama relief initiatives.

A key insight of our account of immigration enforcement is that independent priority-setting by the Executive can, within the scheme of separated powers, actually facilitate the constrained use of power. Much separation of powers scholarship concerns itself with the rise of the imperial presidency, which prompts views that range from cheerful acceptance to alarmism,<sup>174</sup> though whether to cheer or warn often depends on the sources of power the Executive purports to be using.<sup>175</sup> A crucial dynamic missing from this account, which revolves around the assumption that the Executive is the branch in need of constraint, emerges from our observation of how de facto delegation has operated in immigration law. Executive action and priority setting in the exercise of the enforcement power can serve to constrain power in a world of overbroad legislation. For example, the enforcement priorities articulated across administrations to emphasize the removal of security and safety risks constitute executive efforts to construct a more rational screening system within the overinclusive sweep of today's immigration Code.<sup>176</sup>

<sup>176</sup> This is not to say that the immigration enforcement bureaucracy has not been zealous in its mission. Immigrants' rights advocates would charge the Obama administration, in particular, with over enforcement. But this charge often obscures the complexities of institutional context. The prioritization memos issued by various administrations may not have had as significant an impact as

Moreover, the act of actually enforcing the law—of confronting its real world effects—can help point to limits or unintended consequences of the law as drafted.<sup>177</sup> Enforcement brings to life the consequences of legislation—one concrete manifestation of the informational advantages of the Presidency. We should want an Executive Branch to have the power to grapple with those consequences based on its own judgments forged through experience. Indeed, these informational benefits can often only be acquired in a dynamic context, in which executive branch officials have authority to make decisions subsequent to congressional policymaking. For the Executive to respond to the lived experience of the law by shifting priorities can help hold the legislature accountable, but also advance a policy debate by pointing a regulatory regime in better directions.

These epistemic benefits of executive action also bring with them increased policy responsiveness. While responsiveness is no unalloyed virtue, executive branch initiative-taking can perform a valuable constitutional function in immigration policy, particularly within a system that governs a polity marked by deep ideological differences and in a domain where significant legislative reform occurs, at best, once a generation.<sup>178</sup> One way executive-driven priority setting has done so is by offering a counterpoint to the interest groups that may have dominated Congress, with the White House serving as an alternative site for organizing and advocacy for the immigrants' rights social movement. Whatever we think about the merits of their various positions, multiplying outlets for interest group competition, and expression of popular preferences through policy, can promote the responsiveness of government.

their political authors might have liked. As we explore in Part III, the Obama relief policies are themselves a recalibration of enforcement policy to capture that fact. Within the executive branch, the push and pull between political appointees and the civil service ensures that the exercise of the enforcement power will itself consist of mixed goals and imperfect results.

<sup>177</sup> Another example of this dynamic can be found in the resistance by former executive branch officials from the first Bush and Clinton administrations to the mandatory detention provision Congress added to the Code in 1996 for noncitizens in removal proceedings on the basis of having committed an aggravated felony or violation of certain other grounds of removal. When the ACLU took a due process challenge to this provision all the way to the Supreme Court in 2003, numerous former INS officials filed an amicus brief emphasizing how the provision constrained executive discretion to determine whether a noncitizen in removal proceedings could be released on bond in harmful and counter-productive ways. See Brief for T. Alexander Aleinikoff et al. as Amici Curiae Supporting Respondent, DeMore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510 (2003) (No. 01-1491), 2002 WL 31455523, at *4-14.

<sup>178</sup> David Pozen calls for treating certain “remedial” measures taken by the Executive Branch as forms of norm-based self-help that advance separation of powers goals, rather than as self aggrandizing, and emphasizes the value of self-help during times of “agonistic” and “dysfunctional” government. See David E. Pozen, Self-Help and the Separation of Powers, 124 YALE L.J. 2, 7-11 (2014). For reasons explained infra notes 182-182 and accompanying text, we do not regard the two-principal dynamic as depending on polarized or dysfunctional government. Rather, we see it as vital under ordinary circumstances, too, when legislation as either difficult to achieve or when Congress has chosen inaction for other reasons.

To the extent concern about executive policymaking through enforcement stems from the desire for accountability, we don't think the Executive suffers from a democracy deficit as compared to Congress in any meaningful sense.<sup>179</sup> The mechanisms of democratic influence and accountability may differ from those that operate on the legislature, but they exist not only in the President's election mandate, but in the corresponding organization of interest groups that pressure the White House and the agencies, and in the modern media's insistence that the President explain and justify his actions and take his policy initiatives "on the road."<sup>180</sup> In fact, the Obama relief initiatives and the reformulation of Secure Communities offer prime examples of the Executive's responsiveness to popular dissent from administration enforcement policies and the underlying statutory framework that set the stage for them. Relatedly, formal and informal interactions with Congress will itself constrain the Executive. In the war powers context, scholars have drawn attention to such potential. Stephen Griffin, for example, writes of a "cycle of accountability" that consists of interbranch interaction over time through which <sup>179</sup> See infra notes 218-221 (discussing literature concerning presidential administration and value and function of presidential control over agency policy, including by emphasizing relative accountability of President). See generally Andrias, supra note 46 (highlighting accountability of President in defending his and his political appointees' control over enforcement judgments).

<sup>180</sup> The concept of "accountability" merits some unpacking, because it can come in the form of being answerable to the political process, or from the numerous internal constraints that operate within the executive branch and through the application of judicial review over agency action. For a nuanced discussion of forms of accountability, see Gillian Metzger, The Constitutional Duty to Supervise, 124 YALE L.J. (forthcoming 2015) (manuscript at 43-46). Given the numerous internal constraints on the Executive Branch that exist, including competition among agencies in shared regulatory space, centralized White House review of agency action, the presence of lawyers across the branch assigned the function of ensuring executive action comports with law, and institutions such as the Inspectors General, we reject the Posner & Vermeule formulation of the Executive as "unbound." See generally POSNER & VERMEULE, supra note 108 (describing the Executive's power as largely unconstrained by legal mechanisms). See also GOLDSMITH, JACK GOLDSMITH, POWER AND CONSTRAINT: THE ACCOUNTABILITY PRESIDENT AFTER 9/11, at 83-160 (2012) (discussing the inter-agency process, inspectors general, and the role of lawyers as forms of constraint). The ICE agents' union and the lawsuit they have brought challenging DACA represents one potential example of internal constraint, as are the different and generally enforcement-oriented preferences of the bureaucracy. See Rodriguez, Negotiating Conflict Through Federalism: Institutional and Popular Perspectives, supra note 89, at 2110 (discussing role of institutional culture within agencies as part of a coherent picture of "federal" priorities and preferences). Whether there should be more and better internal constraints may be worth debating, and scholars such as Neal Katyal and Gillian Metzger have initiated important inquiries along these lines, but we would be wrong to think of the Executive as a necessarily and truly dangerous branch. See, e.g., Neal Kumar Katyal, Toward Internal Separation of Powers, 116 YALE L.J. POCKET PART 106, 106-110 (2006) (arguing for the implementation of a separation of powers principle within the executive branch, given the scope of the President's power); Gillian Metzger, The Interdependent Relationship Between Internal and External Separation of Powers, 59 EMORY L.J. 423, 425 (2009) (calling for paying close attention to internal administrative design and analyzing which structures serve as the most effective checks on executive power).

“mutual testing and deliberation results,” such that the branches learn from their mistakes.<sup>181</sup>

It may be that robust policymaking through enforcement creates disincentives for Congress to act. But while we could certainly characterize recent immigration history as embodying a failure of congressional will, we doubt that the causes of legislative stasis include executive initiative taking. Whatever the reasons for congressional inaction—whether they be dysfunction, paralysis, or simply the choice not to act—the President’s decision to offer an affirmative, substantive vision can expand the policymaking domain in constructive and idea-generating ways. In this sense, the Executive acts as an engine in the policy-making process. This agenda-setting function may be particularly vital during times of polarization that produce legislative stasis,<sup>182</sup> such as the one we seem to be living through, but this function of executive policy making is by no means limited to such moments like ours.<sup>183</sup> Presidential immigration law can help mitigate one of the ordinary costs of our separation of powers regime—the reluctance or inability of government as a whole to act—thus furthering the interest of a healthy trade-off between power and constraint.

Again, action in and of itself is not necessarily good. And whether executive action of the sort initiated by President Obama in his relief policies will actually prompt further policy deliberation is an empirical question. Executive action often amounts to a second-best alternative to legislation. Nowhere is that more true than in the immigration enforcement context, where prioritization cannot provide legal immigration status to those who receive deferred action under Obama’s relief initiatives.<sup>184</sup> Thus, we should remain concerned with the possibility that executive policymaking will disable or displace Congress in some way—a point we take up in more detail in Part IV. But having a rival or complementary policymaker in the Executive can be good for the democratic and problem-solving features of government.

Our dynamic understanding of the relationship between Congress and the Executive, and our conception of the domain of regulation as one that evolves over time through the exercise of the enforcement power, reflect what we believe to be an important moment in the intellectual history of separation of powers scholarship—both at the descriptive and the normative levels. The constitutional framework sets up institutional rivalries as forms of constraint on government power. But these constraints do not come exclusively from the formal powers the Constitution assigns each branch and the “checks” each one possesses over the other.<sup>185</sup> Our immigration history shows how constraints can also arise from the push and pull of politics and institutional design.<sup>186</sup> Unique to our account is the way in which we illuminate, through history, how constraints on government can arise when each branch acts as an institutional source of policymaking in the same domain.

Importantly, Griffin argues that this cycle has not operated properly since 1945 and that scholars focused on whether Congress has authorized military action miss the deeper problem of the absence of co-deliberation on the use of force. Id. at 8-9. The factors that account for this decline in deliberation are likely complex, but whereas the President has occupied the domain of foreign affairs, Congress remains his rival and counterpoint in the domestic setting.

This idea that the roles and powers of the political branches are defined through a complex historical process that cannot be easily captured through either formal models or deductive, judicial-style reasoning is far from limited to the immigration arena.<sup>187</sup> In fact, it appears even in settings where the Constitution clearly allocates

<sup>185</sup> For a classic statement of three different forms of separation of powers that commentators often conflate, see Jeremy Waldron, Separation of Powers in Thought and Practice?, 54 B.C. L. REV. 433, 438, 442 (2013) (distinguishing between separation of powers, checks and balances, and dispersal of power generally and arguing that separation of powers is, above all, a matter of “articulated governance”).

<sup>186</sup> In Part III, we elaborate on this last point in particular and highlight how dynamics internal to the Executive Branch can serve as sources of constraint. This institutionally grounded conception of the separation of powers serves as a counterpoint to an ascendant line of thinking that rejects the Madisonian theory of separation of powers and emphasizes instead that, to the extent constraints exist on the branches, they come from the “separation of parties,” or divided government. See Bradley & Morrison, supra note 166, at 438–447 (arguing that the Madisonian theory of checks-and-balances on which theories of congressional acquiescence to Executive Branch practice are based no longer accurately describes the relationship between the branches or captures the realities (and difficulties) of legislation); Daryl J. Levinson & Richard H. Pildes, Separation of Parties, Not Powers, 119 HARV. L. REV. 2311 (2006) (arguing that during times of cohesive and polarized politics, competition between the branches will vary widely and may disappear altogether if the branches are controlled by officials from the same party); POSNER & VERMEULE, supra note 108, at 4 (rejecting altogether the notion that a legal concept of separation of powers does any work and arguing that constraints on the Executive come in the form of popular politics). These theories quite successfully dismantle the most abstract and starry-eyed versions of the Madisonian vision. But because their foil is a theory, they operate at a level of institutional abstraction that prevents them from appreciating some of the ways in which institutional constraints within government play a large role in the wielding of the enforcement power—dynamics our immigration history help to bring to light. For an account of internal and external constraints on the Executive Branch that captures some of these institutional realities in the war powers and national security contexts, see JACK GOLDSMITH, POWER AND CONSTRAINT: THE ACCOUNTABLE PRESIDENT AFTER 9/11 (2012).

<sup>187</sup> Our thinking along these lines is ultimately part of a moment in separation of powers scholarship that seeks to understand the nature of power by appreciating how it plays out in practice. Trevor Morrison and Curtis Bradley, for example, call for attention to the role that history plays in the construction of executive power and argue that historical practice can render a particular arrangement constitutional in status. See Morrison & Bradley, supra note 166; Aziz Z. Huq, Removal as a Political Question, 65 STAN. L. REV. 1 (2013) (arguing that the scope of the presidential removal power should be seen as a political question, in part because of political science scholarship suggesting that the removal power does not serve as a constraint on the bureaucracy, which renders judicial intervention in agency design counterproductive); David E. Pozen, Self-Help and the Separation of Powers, 124 YALE

Congress and the President overlapping power, as in the war powers context.<sup>188</sup> As we have emphasized, whether this sort of relationship between the branches proves productive really depends on context. Moreover, policymaking through enforcement judgments presents concerns that policymaking through rule-making does not: the source of delegated authority is less clear, and it can be difficult to externally police the executive decision-making process—concerns we flagged back in 2009. In Part III, we take up this dilemma and explore how the Obama relief policies simultaneously harness the benefits of policymaking through enforcement and enhance accountability and promote constrained government by making enforcement judgments more transparent. Even within our vision of executive policymaking through enforcement, we do believe there should be a limiting principle on executive action, in service of the basic value of constraining government power. We turn now to what that principle might be.

III. THE INSTITUTIONALIZATION OF ENFORCEMENT DISCRETION

The faithful agent model of congressional-executive relations we reject in Part II focuses on the substantive relationship between the choices or values reflected in the INA and those reflected in the President's enforcement of the statute. This approach, we have argued, leads us astray. But that does not mean we think that all bets are off. In this Part, we turn from substance to process and argue that the inquiry into the legality of President Obama's relief programs and other similar exercises of the enforcement power should revolve around whether the Executive should be constitutionally prohibited from institutionalizing prosecutorial discretion in L.J. 2, 10 (2014) (criticizing separation of powers scholarship that turns away from “legal modes of reasoning” and arguing that unwritten, quasi-legal norms shape and constrain interactions across the U.S. government, producing both “retaliation” as well as cooperation); Aziz Z. Huq, The Negotiated Structural Constitution, 114 Colum. L. Rev. 1595 (2014) (arguing that the branches negotiate their institutional interests with one another and that courts are not well placed to monitor these “intermural deals,” which instead should be policed for bad outcomes by elected officials). Though we differ in our conclusions about the nature of executive power and the proper role of Congress and the courts in constraining it, all of this work shares an understanding of inter-branch relationships as constructed over time.

<sup>188</sup> In important recent work on Presidential war powers, for example, Mariah Zeisberg develops a “relational” model of separation of powers and rejects the idea that the branches must adhere to “determinate textual meaning.” MARIAH ZEISBERG, WAR POWERS: THE POLITICS OF CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY (2013). She argues instead that we can evaluate the branches' work based on “how well they bring their special institutional capacities to bear on the problem of interpreting the Constitution's substantive standards about war.” Id. at 18-19. She sees inter-branch conflict as a potentially productive source of both deliberation over constitutional meaning and accountability for ultimate policies. Id., at 30-31. The focus on deliberation and accountability has much in common with Griffin's approach discussed supra note 181. See also Stephen M. Griffin, Zeisberg's Relational Conception of War Authority: Convergence and Divergence in Achieving a New Understanding of War Powers, 95 B.U. L. REV. certain ways.<sup>189</sup> On this account, the concern is not who gets protected from deportation, but how they come to be protected.

Numerous critics of the Obama relief initiatives have focused on these process concerns and declared his actions unconstitutional because of the way they institutionalize the Executive's discretion. One prominent critique holds that the initiatives are unlawful because they provide "categorical" forms of relief, rather than resting on the exercise of "individualized" discretion.<sup>190</sup> A second claim emphasizes that the way the relief initiatives institutionalize discretion threatens to undermine the "rule of law," by which critics mean legal compliance.

This Part explains why these claims are misguided as both a matter of law and theory. As a theoretical matter, these claims about President Obama's relief initiatives are actually just retail-level examples of more general debates that have long-raged in legal theory and administrative law scholarship. We will show that these critiques all boil down to claims about one or more of three choices: the choice between (1) rules versus standards, (2) centralized versus decentralized control over prosecutorial discretion, and (3) secret versus public norms regarding the exercise of that discretion. The Obama relief initiatives' central "innovation" is to bind the exercise of prosecutorial discretion to more rule-like criteria, to centralize the supervision of discretion to a greater extent than is typical in enforcement contexts, and to make the exercise of discretion predictable and transparent. In other words, DACA and DAPA choose rules over standards, centralization over decentralization, and transparency over secrecy.

These choices ultimately advance the core rule of law values of consistency, transparency, and accountability: they ensure that like cases are more likely to be treated alike, that the exercise of discretion is more predictable, and that enforcement outcomes align more closely with the policy preferences of the agency's political leadership and the President himself.<sup>191</sup> This does not mean, of course, that the

<sup>189</sup> Whereas in this Part we focus on why the Obama relief initiatives serve rather than undermine structural separation of powers values, in Part IV we consider what forms of institutionalizing discretion might present constitutional concerns, and we enumerate some of the external sources of constraint that exist.

<sup>191</sup> Anil Kalhan similarly argues that DAPA helps the DHS ensure that "its personnel heed important rule-of-law values such as uniformity, transparency, accountability, and nonarbitrariness." See Anil Kalhan, Deferred Action, Supervised Enforcement Discretion, and the Litigation Over Administrative Action on Immigration, 63 UCLA L. Rev. Discourse 18 (forthcoming 2015). Though a deep analysis of what is meant by rule-of-law values is beyond the scope of this Article, we believe consistency rather than uniformity captures what we can realistically expect from complex enforcement efforts. For a discussion of the difference between uniformity and consistency, see Cristina M. Rodriguez, Uniformity and Integrity in Immigration Law, 123 Yale L.J. F. 499 (2014), <http://www.yalelawjournal.org/forum/uniformity-and-integrity-in-immigration-law>. In addition, we emphasize perceptions of fairness by the regulated public rather than nonarbitrariness, because we are reluctant to describe the differentiated results of a decentralized, diffused decision-making process as necessarily arbitrary.

choices embodied in DACA and DAPA are legally required, or even that they would in all contexts be legally permissible. At a high level of generality and abstracted from the details of the Obama relief initiatives, these choices are contestable. In many situations, good reasons exist to prefer standards to rules, decentralization to centralization, and secrecy to transparency; these choices involve tradeoffs between values at the very core of the American legal tradition. But for this very reason, it is impossible to make much progress in evaluating how those tradeoffs cash out without careful attention to institutional context. And once we understand the institutional realities against which the Obama administration developed its relief initiatives, the choices embodied in DACA and DAPA become easy to defend.

Importantly, we ground our defense of the institutional choices reflected in the Obama relief initiatives by accepting the importance of identifying limiting principles on the enforcement power—principles that arise from constitutional structure and not just extra-legal sources.<sup>192</sup> But we acknowledge that these limits must, given the structure of the modern administrative state, inevitably derive from the contextual application of the broader objectives we identify in this Part and Part II. Critics have been blind to both that institutional context and to the realities of administrative governance. Their view that the institutional choices embodied in DACA and DAPA are unconstitutional (rather than just undesirable) embodies a radical theory that the Constitution sharply restricts the ways in which the Executive may organize itself.

A. Rules and Standards

The Obama administration's relief initiatives institutionalize discretion in an innovative way—just not in the way critics charge.<sup>193</sup> According to critics, DACA and DAPA are unconstitutional because they exercise discretion on a “categorical” rather than an “individualized” basis. The individualized exercise of discretion comports with the canonical form of prosecutorial authority, the argument goes. But <sup>192</sup> In view of the futility of substantive limits, another approach to understanding the enforcement power could be to reject the idea that any constitutional limits exist or can be reliably determined. We might adopt the perspective of Eric Posner and Adrian Vermeule and accept that the only real limits on Executive power come from politics and public opinion. See POSNER & VERMEULE, supra note 108. As we suggest throughout this Article, we reject their descriptive account that legal rules and practices fail to constrain the modern executive. And we share at least one assumption with the critics of the Obama relief initiatives—that the exercise of executive power ought to be disciplined as the result of legal and constitutional considerations.

<sup>193</sup> Some scholars have attempted to characterize DACA and DAPA as run-of-the-mill action by the President, consistent with past practices. See Gilbert, supra note 17. As we explain in Part I, while we think the initiatives are consistent with a history of executive branch policymaking through the exercise of the enforcement power, many of the precedents typically cited for this claim were not of the same scale as DACA or DAPA, and those that were can be characterized as providing only transitional relief. We believe what the administration has done is novel and simultaneously an improvement on the status quo and imperfect (for reasons we explain in Part IV, infra, but not constitutionally defective.

the categorical exercise of discretion amounts to an unconstitutional act of executive “lawmaking.”<sup>194</sup>

It might be tempting to dismiss this claim by pointing to the conceptual flaw in this dichotomy. Every exercise of prosecutorial discretion, including those authorized by the Obama relief initiatives, is “individualized” in the sense that individual persons seek or will be granted relief as individuals.<sup>195</sup> Given this, it is unclear what it even means to say that DACA and DAPA do not involve “individualized” determinations regarding the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. The fact that large numbers of noncitizens who meet the announced eligibility criteria will come forward to apply does not mean that each application will not be adjudicated on an individual basis. This sort of confused talk about individualized decision-making is part of what plagued debates about profiling for years, and the history of that debate shows that there is little profit in trying to make this analytic distinction do much work as a matter of law or theory.<sup>196</sup>

But while the focus on “categorical” decision-making is confused, we can re-characterize this argument to capture what seems to be at the heart of critics’ concern. The core of their objection appears to be that the Obama relief initiatives have substituted rules for standards in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. As a descriptive matter, this claim is essentially accurate. The initiatives innovate because they move from a system of suggestive enforcement guidelines to a much more rule-bound enforcement system. Previously, grants of “deferred action” were made on an ad hoc basis, guided by loose priorities laid out in a series of agency memos on the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. These memos specified dozens of factors relevant to relief determinations (many of which embodied vague standards), and said little about the appropriate relationship between the factors.

<sup>194</sup> See, e.g., Price, supra note 11. In describing the appropriate use of the enforcement power, Price emphasizes that the Executive may engage in priority setting within the parameters of statutory policy but that it may not engage in policymaking. Id. at 677, 749 (“executive officials should understand their task as priority setting within the parameters of statutory policy”). Our claim throughout this Article has been that the structure of immigration law transforms priority setting into policymaking, but that the raison-d’être of the administrative state belies the idea that executive policymaking through enforcement (or rule-making) is constitutionally worrisome.

<sup>195</sup> Leading defenders of the administration’s policy have emphasized that the memos detailing the policy and providing instructions to line-level adjudicators emphasize that they retain discretion to deny deferred action even to those who meet the eligibility criteria. See Written Testimony of Stephen H. Legomsky, Professor, Wash. Univ. Sch. of Law, Written Testimony before the H. Comm. on the Judiciary 10-11 (Feb. 25, 2015), https://lofgren.house.gov/uploadedfiles/legomsky\_testimony.pdf (noting that the memoranda governing both DACA and DAPA “are filled with clear, careful, explicit, repeated commands, to officers to make individualized, case-by-case discretionary judgments”). Even if it were not the case that adjudicators retained discretion beyond application of the eligibility criteria, the adjudications still would be individualized. The distinction between individual and categorical judgments ultimately amounts to a question of framing.

DACA and DAPA reshaped this decision-making process to make it much more rule-bound. (It also formalized the application process, a point we will take up in a moment.) First, DACA and DAPA reduced considerably the number of criteria relevant to eligibility for relief; rather than dozens of factors being relevant, the initiatives selected just a handful. Second, the initiatives replaced loose criteria with more objective ones. Under DAPA, for example, the two most important criteria the applicant must establish are that she has resided in the United States for at least five years, and that she has a child who is a U.S. citizen or green card holder.<sup>197</sup> Third, DACA and DAPA clearly specify the logical relationship among the listed criteria. Each criterion is a necessary condition, meaning that an immigrant must show that she satisfies all of the enumerated criteria in order to be eligible for the exercise of discretionary relief.

Defenders of the relief initiatives have tried to resist the claim that DACA and DAPA have a rule-like structure. The Department of Justice has taken great pains to emphasize—both in the OLC opinion and in the Texas litigation over DAPA—that the relief programs authorize agency personnel to exercise discretion to deny relief to an otherwise-eligible noncitizens.<sup>198</sup> But the preservation of formal discretion does not mean that DACA and DAPA are more rule-like than the regime they would replace. The relevant question is whether, as a causal matter rather than as a formal one, discretion plays as large a role in deferred action determinations under the new initiatives as under the old regime. The answer to that question is unequivocal: while discretion previously pervaded every aspect of each decision, it plays a very limited role. Government-provided data for DACA show that almost no eligible applicants have been denied relief as a matter of discretion. From DACA's inception until the end of 2014, USCIS approved 638,897 applications and denied 38,597.<sup>199</sup> Most denied applications were rejected “based on a determination that the requestor failed to meet certain threshold criteria.”<sup>200</sup> A full 94% of adjudications have resulted in grants. Of the 6% that were rejections, most were based on the failure to satisfy DACA's eligibility criteria, not on the exercise of discretion to deny relief to an otherwise-eligible applicant.<sup>201</sup> Thus, the program appears to have operated, as

<sup>198</sup> In describing DACA and DAPA as preferring rules over standards, we do not take a position on the question whether DAPA constitutes a legislative rule for the purposes of the APA and as understood within administrative law doctrine. We engage that issue more fully in Part IV. Here, we make a legal theory point by using “rules” as compared to “standards” to described the structure of decision-making. The desire to defend against the APA claims in the Texas lawsuit has detracted from candid discussion of what the administration sought to accomplish with DACA and DAPA as a matter of executive branch organization.

<sup>199</sup> See Declaration of Donald W. Neufeld at 10, Texas v. United States, No. 1:14-CV-254 (S.D. Tex. 2015). USCIS accepted 727,164 applications by this date, and 49,670 remained pending.

<sup>200</sup> Id.

<sup>201</sup> To be sure, these correlational statistics cannot, on their own, provide conclusive proof of causation. Because DACA applicants are self-selected, it is theoretically possible that the formal intended, to ensure that certain types of immigration law violators—those who satisfy the rule-like eligibility criteria—succeed in their applications and therefore become protected from deportation.

These outcomes do not mean that the discretion left to USCIS officials is not in some sense “real.” Out of the hundreds of thousands of DACA applications, there do appear to have been some (a small handful) in which adjudicators have denied relief to applicants who otherwise satisfied the eligibility criteria.<sup>202</sup> Thus, our claim is not that the formal preservation of discretion is somehow a sham. The formal discretion left to adjudicators may have been intended to preserve some of the case-by-case flexibility for truly exceptional cases; or perhaps it was mainly intended to insulate the new policies from certain kinds of (misguided) legal challenges.<sup>203</sup> But even if discretion remains relevant in rare cases, it is hard to resist the conclusion that the more rule-like components of the decision will be dispositive of ultimate relief decisions in the vast majority of cases.<sup>204</sup> This reality is, in fact, precisely why preservation of discretion plays a much larger role than these data suggest. If many potential applicants would be denied relief as a matter of discretion, and if these potential applicants can accurately predict the discretionary denial with great precision and therefore decline to apply whenever they anticipate that they will lose at the discretionary stage, then we would observe few discretionary denials, even though the presence of discretionary authority played a large role in the program. But while such a scenario is observationally equivalent to what we observe in the grant-rate data, it is not equivalently plausible.

<sup>203</sup> See infra text accompanying notes 292-301 (discussing, and rejecting, the view that a more rule-bound regime of prosecutorial discretion might run afoul of the APA’s “legislative rule” jurisprudence.)

<sup>204</sup> In many decision-making structures that mixes rules and standards—including DACA and DAPA—the relative importance of different criteria cannot be determined as a matter of pure logical deduction. For example, it would have been fully consistent with the formal decision-making rules for DACA adjudicators to have denied relief, as a matter of discretion, to half of all otherwise eligible applicants. And certainly other immigration relief programs, such as cancellation of removal (which also mixes rules and discretion) have much higher rates of discretionary denial.

It is interesting to note, however, that a pretty regular pattern does seem to emerge in legal decision-making rules that combine a complex set of eligibility criteria with a back-end grant of discretionary authority: the rule-like stage seems to reduce the role discretion plays. See generally Adam B. Cox & Thomas J. Miles, The Transformation of Voting Rights Jurisprudence, 75 U. CHI. L. REV. 1493 (2008) (testing empirically the constraining power of rules in these sorts of mixed decision-making structures). Asylum determinations are a good illustration of this phenomenon. Adjudicators must determine whether an applicant meets the legal definition of refugee or otherwise falls within any legal bars to asylum. But even if an applicant satisfies the criteria for asylum, and adjudicator still retains the discretion to deny an application for equitable reasons. In practice, the existence of the eligibility criteria has disciplined the inquiry and narrowed the authority of adjudicators, with the result that only a small percentage of asylum applicants who satisfy the eligibility criteria are denied asylum as a matter of discretion. And while there is some possibility that discretionary denials are suppressed because asylum law’s malleable eligibility criteria make it easy for adjudicators to conduct legal analysis that comports with their preferred outcome, thereby obviating the need to deny applications on discretionary grounds, the DACA and DAPA criteria are not nearly so malleable.

the administration replaced a wholly discretionary regime subject to suggestive guidance and ad hoc supervision with a rule-like application process in which discretion was limited to a backstopping role. As a practical matter, the structure of DACA and DAPA significantly constrains, if not functionally eliminates, the discretion those adjudicating relief applications.

Critics are thus correct that the Obama initiatives replaced the old regime of discretion with a new regime bound by rules. Contrary to the critics, however, we do not believe this renders the programs unconstitutional. For these critics, the articulation of objective criteria and the overwhelming grant rates for DACA applicants who met the criteria renders the program an unconstitutional act of executive “lawmaking.”<sup>205</sup> Under this view, the distinction between rules and standards maps onto the constitutional division between “legislative” authority under Article I and “executive” authority under Article II; vague standards are less “legislative” than clear rules, and vice versa. But even for those who subscribe to formalistic accounts of the constitutional separation of powers, under which each branch exercises power of a particular type (and we are not among them), this argument makes little sense. Taken seriously, it would lead to the conclusion that Congress improperly exercises Article II “executive” authority when it enacts vague standards into law. The Sherman Antitrust Act would be unconstitutional, along with myriad other laws.<sup>206</sup> Such an argument would require a robust reinvigoration of the nondelegation doctrine. It also would require courts to conclude that administrative agencies improperly usurp Article I “legislative” authority whenever they issue regulations that embody bright-line rules. So much for the modern administrative state.

More generally, American law rarely constitutionalizes the choice between rules and standards in public administration. Courts have in some cases constitutionally required reliance on rules—generally in cases where courts perceive a significant risk that discretionary decision-making will serve as cover for discriminatory decision-making. This idea runs through a number of First Amendment doctrines and helps explain the Warren Court’s criminal procedure revolution.<sup>207</sup> In other circumstances, courts have constitutionally prohibited reliance on rules, generally where courts have concluded that adjudicatory discretion (and often a particular adjudicatory forum) must be preserved in order to secure the liberty or property interests of individuals protected by the Due Process Clause. The prohibition on categorical rules for pretrial detention in the criminal context offers a prominent example.<sup>208</sup> But these instances are clear exceptions to the general agnosticism of constitutional law on this question.

<sup>205</sup> See, e.g., Price, supra note 11. As noted above, this claim is sometimes cast as a formalist argument about the separation of powers: the idea is that the distinction between rules and standards maps onto the constitutional division between “legislative” authority under Article I and “executive” authority under Article II. See supra text accompanying notes 169-171.

Even if the choice whether to structure decision-making rigidly or flexibly rarely raises constitutional questions, it does implicate a question at the heart of twentieth-century administrative law and bureaucratic design: What is the best way to mete out mass justice, including in contexts like the one at issue here, in which millions of cases demand the attention of the Executive?<sup>209</sup> Attempts to answer generally must grapple with the foundational tradeoff between rules and standards, as the Obama administration was forced to do in evaluating its abilities to conform immigration enforcement to the priorities articulated by DHS leadership. Rules promote equal treatment across cases, but they necessarily define “like cases” in a more reductionist way than standards. Broad standards and “individualized discretion” can foster more fine-grained judgments about when justice or other equitable factors support relief.<sup>210</sup> But they necessarily achieve nuance at the expense of equal treatment across cases—especially in a world where the same decision-maker cannot decide all cases and power is diffused across a bureaucracy.<sup>211</sup>

There is no single answer to how best to strike these tradeoffs. In the context of mass administrative justice, however, the choice whether to adopt rules or open-ended discretion is closely linked to the question whether to centralize authority within the bureaucracy and exert significant supervisory authority over line-level executive officials. Within the Executive Branch, rules facilitate oversight and make it easier for high-level executive branch officials, many of whom are politically accountable, to prevent low-level agents from imposing their own views about when and how the law should be enforced.<sup>212</sup> But rather than eliminating discretion from the system, as critics charge, constraining low-level decision-makers with rules simply

<sup>210</sup> On the tradeoffs between rules and standards, see, for example, FREDERICK SCHAUER, PLAYING BY THE RULES: A PHILOSOPHICAL EXAMINATION OF RULE-BASED DECISION-MAKING IN LAW AND IN LIFE (1991); Colin S. Diver, The Optimal Precision of Administrative Rules, 93 YALE L.J. 65 (1983); and Isaac Ehrlich & Richard A. Posner, An Economic Analysis of Legal Rulemaking, 3 J. LEGAL STUD. 257 (1974).

<sup>211</sup> Another conventional tradeoff between rules and standards is that rules are often more costly to specify ex ante and less costly to apply ex post. See Louis Kaplow, Rules Versus Standards: An Economic Analysis, 42 DUKE L.J. 557, 562-63 (1992). This tradeoff is also important to understanding why DACA and DAPA were likely structured the way they were, because they place the costly process of ex ante specification in the hands of high-level political officials rather than line-level bureaucrats.

<sup>212</sup> Cf. See Elizabeth Magill & Adrian Vermeule, Allocating Power Within Agencies, 120 YALE L.J. 1032, 1078 (2011) (noting coordination costs of diffusion of authority within the bureaucracy but suggesting countervailing value of promoting independence by empowering the civil service).

relocates discretion to a point higher up in the bureaucracy. It is in this sense that discretion most truly remains within the system under the President's relief initiatives. That discretion simply belongs primarily to the Secretary of Homeland Security, Jeh Johnson, the officer to whom the INA formally delegates discretionary enforcement authority.<sup>213</sup> He retains the power to alter the criteria for relief in any way he sees fit, or even to cancel the relief programs.<sup>214</sup> And once we acknowledge that the formal discretion left to line-level adjudicators to deny relief is of little practical importance, this transfer of discretion becomes all the more pronounced. We doubt Secretary Johnson (of his own volition or at the President's direction) will exercise his discretion to alter or terminate the program. But this doubt does not mean that Secretary Johnson actually lacks discretion; it simply means that we are confident about how that discretion will be exercised.<sup>215</sup>

B. Supervision, Not Separation of Powers

The argument that “categorical rules” violate some requirement of “individualized discretion” really amounts to an argument that the supervision and centralization of discretion in immigration law are prohibited. The prohibition on centralization could be cast as a statutory directive, as a constitutional requirement, or as an imperative of good institutional design. So far as we are aware, no one has advanced the statutory argument—that Congress embedded in the immigration code a requirement that enforcement discretion be located exclusively in the hands of line-level enforcement personnel. This argument's absence is unsurprising, given that nearly all the statutory developments of the last several decades point in the other direction, promoting consolidation rather than diffusion within the Executive <sup>213</sup> See INA § 103, 8 U.S.C. § 1103 (“The Secretary of Homeland Security shall be charged with the administration and enforcement of this chapter and all other laws relating to the immigration and naturalization of aliens.”); 6 U.S.C. § 202 (“The Secretary, acting through the Under Secretary for Border and Transportation Security, shall be responsible for the following . . . (5) Establishing national immigration enforcement policies and priorities.”). There is some irony in the fact that critics are arguing that enforcement discretion cannot constitutionally be exercised by the statutory delegatee but instead must be exercised by a set of subordinate officials. We explore below the radical nature of this claim about the structure of the administrative state.

---

<sup>214</sup> Though the President announced the DAPA initiative, Secretary Johnson issued the memos governing the program. See supra notes 102, 105. The White House clearly was involved in the formulation of DAPA, as evidenced by the fact that the OLC opinion analyzing the program's legality was addressed both to the Secretary and to the White House Counsel. See OLC Op., supra note 7, at 1. Though we speak in terms of the President's authority, therefore, the enforcement judgments we describe throughout the article are clearly the product of collaboration within the Executive Branch, with the Secretary of Homeland Security and the leadership of DHS playing the key role in mediating presidential preferences and the management of the bureaucracy.

<sup>215</sup> This confidence that Jeh Johnson will not reverse course leads some to believe that the relief is thereby more durable than ordinary decisions to defer prosecutions—a view that leads some to (wrongly) characterize relief as a grant of “legal status.” See infra text accompanying notes 260–261.

Branch of authority to make discretionary decisions about who should be deported.<sup>216</sup>

Accordingly, we focus in this section on the institutional and constitutional versions of the anti-centralization claim. As a matter of institutional design, we show that the efforts in DACA and DAPA to centralize decision-making have been significant administrative improvements on the practices of diffused prosecutorial discretion that preceded them. Second, we show that the notion that either the separation of powers generally, or the Take Care Clause in particular, constitutionalizes decentralization within the Executive Branch, in the way imagined by critics of the relief programs, is wildly implausible.<sup>217</sup>

1. Institutional Design

The long-term trend in American bureaucracy has been toward centralization—elevating decisions within agencies themselves, as well as above agencies into the Executive Office of the President (EOP). Political scientists and legal scholars from Terry Moe to Elena Kagan have documented this trend,<sup>218</sup> and unitary theorists on <sup>216</sup> One particularly salient set of examples is the 1996 amendments to the INA that eliminated the authority that immigration judges had to grant relief from deportation. As we explained in 2009, these changes took place against a status quo in which the enforcement arm of the INS (now DHS) had considerable discretion about whom to place in proceedings in the first place. Rather than squeezing out discretion, the 1996 amendments simply consolidated discretion in the hands of enforcement officials by removing it from the hands of the somewhat more independent immigration judges. See Cox & Rodriguez, supra note 4, at 517-19. A similar story can be told about the slow death of a procedure, known as judicial recommendation against deportation (JRAD), which permitted an Article III judge to grant relief from deportation in the course of adjudicating federal criminal case. See Padilla v. Kentucky, 559 U.S. 356 (2010). Congress narrowed JRAD authority in 1990 and then eliminated it in the same 1996 amendments that stripped immigration judges of discretionary authority. See id. The elimination of JRAD took discretionary authority that was dispersed out to the federal judiciary and consolidated it in the hands of executive branch officials responsible for policing and prosecuting immigration violations.

<sup>217</sup> Some constitutional constraints surely exist on the organization and staffing of the bureaucracy, though none of the constraints clearly required by the Constitution of Court doctrine apply to the sorts of choices we identify here. See Magill & Vermeule, supra note 212, at 1038-41 (discussing constitutional rules that constrain agency structure, such as the Constitution's Appointments Clause and the law governing removal, as well as the demands of procedural due process that require hearings or individualized processes in certain circumstances).

the right and advocates of presidential administration on the left have defended it.<sup>219</sup> Even recent developments in the Supreme Court's administrative law canon have promoted and (implicitly) defended administrative centralization.<sup>220</sup>

Considered abstractly, of course, it would be difficult to identify a single, optimal level of centralization within the bureaucracy that applies across agencies and regulatory contexts. It is unsurprising, therefore, that a number of administrative law scholars have resisted Kagan's normative gloss on the centralization Moe describes.<sup>221</sup> In the critics' telling, centralization can diminish transparency, obscure lines of accountability, undermine expert decisionmaking, and politicize agency action.

But our argument that the Obama relief initiatives promote the more disciplined and accountable use of executive power does not depend on taking a side in this general debate. If the last two decades of scholarship prove anything, it is that the appropriate level of centralization cannot be determined in the abstract; it must turn on details about how the relevant institutions operate in practice. Those who have argued that Obama's relief programs are unconstitutional have mostly elided this institutional detail. But this very detail offers up a unique policy experiment against which we can actually assess the trade-offs made by Obama's relief initiatives. If we evaluate the Obama relief initiatives in terms of what they replaced, we see how those initiatives promise to significantly improve the ex post screening system by regularizing it through the supervision of line officials.

Prior to DACA and DAPA, the administration launched a prosecutorial discretion initiative that sought to preserve but guide line-level enforcement authority. The Obama administration announced this initiative in June 2011 with the release of the so-called Morton Memos. Those directives laid out the criteria the political leadership of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and DHS bureaucracy. It is clear from the roll out of the initiatives, however, that the White House was intimately involved in overseeing the development of the initiatives.

<sup>219</sup> See, e.g., Kagan, supra note 218; Andrias, supra note 46; Steven G. Calabresi & Saikrishna Prakash, The President's Power to Execute the Laws, 104 YALE L.J. 541 (1994); Steven Croley, White House Review of Agency Rulemaking: An Empirical Investigation, 70 U. CHI. L. REV. 821 (2003).

<sup>220</sup> See Magill & Vermeule, supra note 212, at 1061-1072; David J. Barron & Elena Kagan, Chevron's Nondelegation Doctrine, 2001 SUP. CT. REV. 201. Recently, Gillian Metzger has reminded us that centralization and supervision are not just often desirable—sometimes these forms of oversight can be constitutionally mandatory. See Metzger, supra note 173, at 1903 (arguing that the constitution imposes such a duty to ensure that the exercise of executive power is “according to law” rather than arbitrary, as well as to ensure that it is politically accountable). The possibility that supervision can be constitutionally mandatory is a commonplace in federal courts doctrine and scholarship, but it has far too often been overlooked in writing about administrative law.

intended to govern the exercise of prosecutorial discretion by ICE employees.<sup>222</sup> The memos defined “prosecutorial discretion” broadly to encompass nearly every sort of enforcement decision made by ICE agents, including, crucially, the decision to initiate removal proceedings and the decision to grant deferred action. As we noted in Part I, the memos were far from the first such documents; officials in both the Bush and Clinton administrations issued guidance documents listing criteria intended to inform myriad discretionary enforcement judgments.<sup>223</sup> Yet both the content of the Morton Memos and the timing of their release, coinciding as they did with broader agency efforts designed to bring consistency to the system of screening noncitizens for deportability, led many advocates to see the memos as heralding a new era in which immigration discretion would be wielded on a more widespread and consistent basis.<sup>224</sup> This assumption may have been overly optimistic. The memos only articulated priorities; they did not indicate an intention not to remove low-priority targets, nor did they identify the means by which the priorities would inform the actual judgments of the line agents diffused across the country. By touting the memos, however, the administration made a kind of political promise to shift the brunt of the enforcement system away from status violators and toward more serious offenders.

Many of the Morton Memos’ factors for exercising prosecutorial discretion (and granting deferred action) bear a marked similarity to the deferred action criteria eventually embodied in DACA. The factors included an immigrant’s length of residence in the United States, as well as educational history, family ties, and criminal record (or lack thereof)—factors closely related to the eligibility criteria for both DACA and DAPA.<sup>225</sup> Having been a child when one migrated to the United States—the keystone criterion under DACA—was also deemed important under the Morton

Memos.<sup>226</sup> Although the factors in the Morton Memos were less precise and more numerous, and although the logical relationship among them was not well defined, their resemblance to the DACA and DAPA priorities is unmistakable.<sup>227</sup>

Despite this resemblance, however, the Morton Memos had little of the effect of DACA (and presumably of DAPA once implemented) and provoked much less public controversy than either of the Obama relief initiatives.<sup>228</sup> In the months following the memos' June 2011 release, there were few observable changes in the exercise of immigration prosecutorial discretion. According to widespread accounts, ICE continued to place immigrants who should have been among the lowest enforcement priorities in removal proceedings, routinely ignoring individual requests for deferred action.<sup>229</sup> Moreover, a large-scale review of over 300,000 ongoing removal cases, implemented in conjunction with the memos' release in order to identify those cases in which prosecutorial discretion was warranted, resulted in a very small number of case closures.<sup>230</sup> And while the fraction of criminal deportees

<sup>226</sup> While the Morton Memos took pains to note that its list of factors was not exhaustive, they simultaneously emphasized that "there are certain classes of individuals that warrant particular care," including "minors" and "individuals present in the United States since childhood." Id. at 5; see also id. at 4 (highlighting "the circumstances of the person's arrival in the United States and the manner of his or her entry, particularly if the alien came to the United States as a young child").

<sup>227</sup> This highlights another puzzling aspect of the arguments from congressional intent we criticized in Part II: the Morton Memos could have been subjected to pretty much the same wooden congressional priorities critique that has been leveled against DACA and DAPA. Many of the Morton Memos' criteria are not clearly supported by the text of the INA, and some of them are in tension with discrete provisions of the Code. Yet many who criticize the President's relief programs express no doubts about the legality of the Morton Memos. See, e.g., OLC Memorandum Opinion, supra note 7. Even the Texas district court that recently enjoined both DACA and DAPA took pains to emphasize its view that the Morton Memos reflected the lawful exercise of prosecutorial discretion by the agency. See Texas v. United States, No. 1:14-CV-254, at 118-19 (D. Tx. 2015).

<sup>228</sup> In a notable exception, a group of ICE officers in the Houston field office contested the new prosecutorial discretion policy, arguing that it created a "secretive review process." The National ICE union eventually passed a no-confidence motion citing ICE Director John Morton and Assistant Director Phyllis Coven. See Marjorie S. Zatz & Rodriguez, The Limits of Discretion: Challenges and Dilemmas of Prosecutorial Discretion in Immigration Enforcement, 39 L. & SOC. INQUIRY 666, 677-78 (2014). Some members of Congress also, predictably, criticized the memos, see Roseblum, supra note 3, at 5, n.13, though the concerns did not get widespread traction.

did go up somewhat through this period, that trend appears to be largely the product of changes to other enforcement initiatives, not to the Morton Memos themselves.

Additional evidence of the Morton Memos' ineffectiveness can be seen in the operation of Secure Communities, another signature Obama enforcement initiative. That program, launched in the fall of 2008 by the Bush DHS, turned every local criminal arrest in the country into a point of immigration screening.<sup>231</sup> Universal immigration screening at the point of arrest provides a tremendous amount of information to the federal government—information that can be used (and that the government has argued was designed to be used) to make decisions about removal both more consistent and more responsive to federal priorities. Under the program, federal officials, not local police, decided whether to place an immigrant identified through arrest data in removal proceedings.<sup>232</sup>

If the Morton Memos had actually significantly impacted the decisions made by agency personnel about whether to place a particular immigrant in removal proceedings, one would have expected to see that impact reflected in the pool of immigrants arrested by ICE under the Secure Communities program; those memos apply directly to arrest decisions made by ICE agents under Secure Communities. Yet no effect was apparent in the wake of the Morton Memos' release. The figure below shows the composition of that pool over time, broken down by the criminal history of those apprehended and placed in deportation proceedings following notification to DHS as part of Secure Communities.<sup>233</sup> Two aspects of the figure stand out. First, a large percentage of people placed in proceedings under the program had no criminal history at all: nearly a third had no criminal conviction, despite the fact that the program was publicly touted as a means of targeting backlog.html [http://perma.cc/XU74-ZZT3] (only 1.5% closed by May 29, 2012). The low rate of closure was exacerbated by delays in background checks, as well as by the fact that a fair number of respondents declined offers of administrative closure, presumably because they had pending claims for more permanent forms of relief. See American Immigration Council, Immigration Policy Center, Prosecutorial Discretion: A Statistical Analysis (June 11, 2012), <http://www.immigrationpolicy.org/just-facts/prosecutorial-discretion-statistical-analysis> [http://perma.cc/XT9F-TSP5]. Even adjusting for these facts, the rates of eligibility remain remarkably low and declined as the program proceeded. <sup>231</sup> For an overview of the program see Adam B. Cox & Thomas J. Miles, Policing Immigration, 80 U. CHI. L. REV. 87 (2012). The program involved data-sharing between the FBI and DHS. State and local police departments routinely route fingerprint data collected during arrests to the FBI. Under Secure Communities, that data was forwarded to DHS and compared to a large database containing information on essentially every noncitizen encountered by the agency. If the database returned a hit, ICE then determined whether the arrestee was potentially removable and, if so, whether to issue a request that police detain the person until ICE assumed custody.

<sup>232</sup> See id. at 131-25; see also Cox & Posner, supra note 80, at 1344-46.

“criminal aliens.” Second, the composition of the arrestee pool did not change at all after the Morton Memos were released. The arrest decisions of line-level ICE agents under Secure Communities looks much the same before and after June 2011.<sup>234</sup> While the memos formally singled out noncitizens without prior convictions as lower priorities for removal, the reality on the ground was that they were just as likely to be arrested by ICE after the memos’ announcement.<sup>235</sup>

Criminal History of Noncitizens Arrested by ICE Under Secure Communities

These data highlight the inability of the Morton Memos to produce meaningful changes in the exercise of immigration discretion.<sup>236</sup> In retrospect, this limitation of a <sup>234</sup> To be clear, there are some longer-term enforcement trends that bridge the release of the Morton Memos. The fraction of deportees with a criminal record had been rising since 2008, and this trend continued after the memo’s release. But the memos cannot explain that rise, as it preceded their release by several years.

<sup>235</sup> It is certainly possible that, after a number of years, the Morton Memos would have been institutionalized in supervisory or disciplinary strategies so they might ultimately have had some effects on enforcement. But as we explain below, we are very skeptical that any such strategies could have precipitated a shift that comes close to matching the effects of DACA and what would likely result from the implementation of DAPA—the guarantee that millions of unauthorized immigrants would be immune from removal for defined periods of time with the likelihood of indefinite continuation into the future.

<sup>236</sup> Another, perhaps more cynical, view of the Morton Memos is that they were motivated largely by politics, or the desire to curry favor with immigrant advocacy and Latino communities, rather than by a genuine desire to change the types of unauthorized migrants being deported from the guidance document-oriented approach should not be surprising. The memos would have had to change the behavior of large numbers of ICE agents—the line-level enforcement personnel principally responsible for making decisions about whether to place an immigrant into removal proceedings.<sup>237</sup> Many agents were extremely resistant to the memos' central goal, some quite vocally. They work within a law enforcement agency that has an enforcement-oriented and results-driven institutional culture, not unlike the cultures of the FBI or the DEA. It should not be surprising to find resistance within the ranks to the premise of the Morton Memos. Men and women who see their jobs as punishing lawbreakers could have felt as if they were being directed to ignore the transgressions of immigration violators.<sup>238</sup> This discontent ultimately bubbled up through the employees' union,<sup>239</sup> and once DACA was announced, some members of the union filed suit against the Secretary of DHS, arguing that the policies required them to violate their legal duties to enforce immigration law.<sup>240</sup>

Even if the failure of the Morton Memos to significantly reshape the exercise of prosecutorial discretion comes as no surprise, it was quite consequential. It bolstered forces—both inside and outside the agency—that sought to draw critical attention to

United States. On this view, it should also be no surprise that the Memo had little effect. Regardless of its true aim (or whether it is even possible to characterize it as having a single aim), opponents of the administration's deportation policies were able to use the Memo's "failure" as a focal point for messaging and organizing that helped create the political conditions that gave rise to DACA in 2012. See supra text accompanying notes 95-96.

<sup>237</sup> This question of whether and how to control line-level prosecutors, and even the U.S. Attorneys themselves, has been a perennial one in analyses of federal criminal law. See, e.g., Kate Stith, The Arc of the Pendulum: Judges, Prosecutors, and the Exercise of Discretion, 117 YALE L.J. 1420, 1469-70 (2008) (analyzing a discretion memo issued by Attorney General John Ashcroft and concluding that it established no enforcement mechanism and left space for flexible application in its language, and that the lack of sufficient numbers of attorneys in Main Justice in Washington, D.C. to monitor the thousands of local line attorneys in field offices thwarted its centralizing goal); James Vorenberg, Decent Restraint of Prosecutorial Power, 94 HARV. L. REV. 1521, 1562-63 (1981) (arguing that guidelines to prosecutors need to be "specific enough to provide genuine guidance when applied to a particular set of facts").

<sup>238</sup> This enforcement culture is, in part, the product of the culture within the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), the legacy agency that was abolished in the Homeland Security Act of 2002, Pub. L. 107-296, 116 Stat. 2135 (2002). And the law enforcement orientation within the INS was one reason advocates had long argued that the enforcement and services functions of the agency should be separated. The 2002 Act did so, locating enforcement functions within ICE and CBP while services functions were located within CIS. <sup>240</sup> See Crane v. Napolitano, No. 3:12-cv-03247, 2013 WL 8211660 (N.D. Tex. July 31, 2013) (dismissal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction), aff'd sub nom. Crane v. Johnson, No. 14-10049, 2015 WL 1566621 (5th Cir. Apr. 7, 2015) (dismissal affirmed on standing grounds). Though the suit specifically attacks the shape of DACA, it embodies a distinct approach to enforcement discretion than the one the administration sought to advance even before DACA, thus undermining DHS leadership's attempts to channel that discretion through informal, standards-based guidelines.

the administration's deportation policies generally. Many advocates initially regarded the memos as a strong promise of protection, and their disappointment helped create the political conditions that ultimately persuaded the administration of the need to centralize enforcement judgments in order to better insure protection of mere status violators.<sup>241</sup>

For critics of the Obama relief initiative, this influence of politics on the formulation and timing of DACA underscores that the President engaged in impermissible policymaking. We contend, however, that the inter-weaving of political and institutional incentives for administrative reorganization is to be expected generally and can often be salutary. The move to a more rule-bound and centralized regime provided the rule-of-law benefits associated with promoting consistency in official decision-making, amplifying political control and, most importantly, instituting accountability over the enforcement power. On top of that, we are aware of no evidence that the pre-DACA regime of prosecutorial discretion guided by informal memoranda was not serving the salutary function typically associated with discretion—promoting fine-grained judgments involving individual equities about when the initiation of removal proceedings is warranted. In the case of the Obama initiatives, then, the benefits of centralization and the rule-like inquiry it entailed came without the costs typically associated with a move away from discretion. The fact that the same initiatives advanced the political goals of the administration is not a reason to declare them suspicious, much less unconstitutional. Instead, the evolution of the Morton Memos into the Obama relief initiatives underscores our claims in Part II about the potential value of a two principals model of enforcement.

The trajectory of the Morton Memos also explains what we believe to be the most salient features of Obama's relief initiatives for the purposes of evaluating their legality. DACA made two interrelated institutional changes to the prior regime of discretion. In addition to the turn to rules that we discussed in the previous section—a move that facilitated oversight of the bureaucracy and constrained lower-level decision-makers—DACA changed the decision-makers themselves. Not only did the Obama initiative locate the bulk of discretion in the hands of DHS leadership, it took the process of individual adjudication out of the hands of line-level ICE agents and the enforcement arm of the immigration bureaucracy and handed it over to personnel in USCIS, the arm of DHS responsible for conferring immigration benefits.<sup>242</sup>

Though this shift to USCIS might seem to have further fractured enforcement responsibilities across the bureaucracy, since ICE remains responsible for enforcement generally, it in fact had the effect of further centralizing discretion. USCIS concentrated the decision-makers in just a few service center locations, with the vast majority of decisions to be made at a single center in northern Virginia based on paper applications, rather than having them dispersed to field offices around the nation. Even more important, it amounted to DHS leadership, presumably in consultation with the White House, selecting the agency component more likely to share the views of the President and agency leadership and therefore more amenable to oversight in its administration of the program.<sup>243</sup> As the benefits-granting component of DHS, USCIS is more likely to be institutionally predisposed to viewing immigrants as claimants with potential entitlements than ICE, which is more likely to see them as lawbreakers. This change in decision-makers, combined with the adoption of rules, thus facilitated the centralization of prosecutorial discretion decisions within the Department of Homeland Security, making it possible to overcome the Department's seeming inability to supervise the exercise of discretion under the Morton Memos regime.

Seen through this lens, the President's relief initiatives form part of a broader trend in recent years towards the centralization and reorganization of immigration enforcement authority. We documented some of this movement in The President and Immigration Law, which showed how a series of statutory changes shifted discretionary authority that had previously been held by individual immigration judges within the Justice Department to DHS.<sup>244</sup> Other data-points in this trend include the rollout of Secure Communities, along with the scaling back of section 287(g) agreements that sometimes gave considerable discretionary immigration authority to local officials.<sup>245</sup> To be sure, the pattern of centralization has been complicated. It would be a mistake to suggest that significant authority over the shape of immigration law no longer exists outside Executive leadership, or that such diffusion of authority could ever be extinguished, since immigration enforcement <sup>243</sup> This story highlights the role of an agency's institutional culture in limiting the ability of high-level executive branch officials to quickly redirect the institution's priorities. At the same time, it shows the ways in which bureaucratic redundancy can diffuse the constraints that institutional culture might place on the pace of policy change. Because there were two agencies within the Department of Homeland Security with legal authority to make decisions on deferred action, the leadership within the Department could select the agency with an institutional culture more in line with the goals of the administrative initiative. See generally Jason Marisam, The President's Agency Selection Powers, 65 ADMIN. L. REV. 821 (2013). Cf. Magill & Vermeule, supra note 212, at 1040 (arguing that where top officials have a closer relationship to the President, they are more likely to override others within the agency, suggesting that assignment of responsibility based on proximity of views to the President and political leadership can enable greater control of the bureaucracy by those delegated the power at issue).

depends on public and private institutions beyond the federal bureaucracy.<sup>246</sup> Nonetheless, these recent developments show that DACA and DAPA, far from being anomalous, reflect the latest significant moves in the ongoing re-organization and centralization of the immigration bureaucracy.

This series of recent institutional changes has helped constrain and control the use of the enforcement power in an immigration regime that today gives the Executive capacious authority. The Obama relief initiatives promise to do the same, if and when the administration can fully implement them. The tradeoffs between rules and standards and centralization and diffusion may be intractable in the abstract, but in this context they point clearly in one direction.

2. Constitutionalized Decentralization

Our account of the institutional dynamics leading up to the Obama relief initiatives also has the benefit of highlighting a strange idea implicit in the conception of the separation of powers advanced by the President's critics. On the one hand, these critics complain about the failure of the executive branch to serve as Congress's faithful agent. They worry about the lack of sufficiently strong checks on principal-agent problems that arise across the branches. But they would address this problem by constitutionally prohibiting the President from attempting to ameliorate principal-agent problems within the executive branch, arguing that the President cannot take a centralizing step to ensure that the priorities reflected in immigration enforcement match his agenda, instead of being subject to the whims of tens of thousands of line-level agents within the immigration bureaucracy.

Perhaps critics who make this claim believe that bureaucratic insulation from either politically appointed agency heads, or from the Executive Office of the President itself, actually furthers congressional control. The perennial argument in administrative law in favor of empowering the civil service sometimes takes this form, emphasizing that these employees are less likely than a political appointee or the President himself to ignore the wishes of Congress, or to be motivated by aggrandizement of the President and his political party.<sup>247</sup> This idea also sometimes animates arguments for independent agencies.<sup>248</sup>

To the extent the arguments in favor of insulating low-level bureaucrats intend to promote Congress's substantive enforcement priorities, we are deeply skeptical of their purchase in this context. As we explained in Part II, the work of the Congresses that enacted the various provisions that have constructed the Executive's domain over immigration enforcement do not embody any coherent enforcement priorities. Insulating low-level bureaucrats from the President in this setting, therefore, will not facilitate their compliance with congressional priorities. It will simply enable them to freely pursue their own agendas.

More importantly, when theorists argue that insulating bureaucrats from the President may empower Congress, they do so primarily to defend the claim that the Constitution permits Congress to legislate such insulation by adopting new organizational structures for administrative entities, such as staggered-term commissions, or restrictions on the President's removal power.<sup>249</sup> Here, in sharp contrast, constitutional critics argue that the President's relief initiatives are invalid because the Constitution requires this sort of insulation—even if neither Congress nor the President prefers it. This claim amounts to radical constitutional theory. On this account, the Constitution imposes stringent dictates on the internal organization of the Executive Branch, precluding even the modest effort to discipline the exercise of prosecutorial discretion within an agency by subjecting its exercise to somewhat more rule-like criteria. Even if one thought that the idea of empowering low-level bureaucrats to resist supervision might be attractive in certain situations, constitutionalizing those views in a way that prohibits other organizational judgments by either Congress or the President would be a mistake.

In light of the foregoing analysis, the scope of our two-principals account in Part II comes into further relief. Our concept of the Executive as a second principal necessarily entails permitting politically accountable leadership to exert supervisory authority over line-level agents. But our account certainly does not require disabling line-level officials. After all, the informational advantages the Executive possesses—the learning that comes through enforcement and that should inform ongoing policymaking—enters the system first and foremost through the work of line-level agents and bureaucrats and their operations in the regulatory field. The Executive's capacity to act as a second principal depends on diffusion in this sense—on the actual officials who produce regulatory reality and see the operation of the law in practice. But what the Obama relief initiatives seek to do is to channel and control the information flow from the field to the center, and our claim in this Part has been that such control should not be constitutionally prohibited and may sometimes be constitutionally required. As in the criminal justice system, each individual immigration prosecutor or law enforcement official possesses small-scale policy-making power. When structured with the sorts of rule of law values we explore in this section, the power that gives to the Executive as a whole should be understood as both legitimate and productive.

<sup>249</sup> Such arguments are necessary because others, in particular those who subscribe to certain theories of the “unitary executive,” believe that this sort of congressional interference is unconstitutional. The President, these scholars argue, is constitutionally entitled to supervise decision-making within the executive branch. See sources cited supra note 219.

C. Transparency and the Rule of Law

As we noted at the outset of this Part, the Obama relief policies implicate a third trade-off—between transparency and secrecy. One might worry that increased transparency pits two laudable rule-of-law values against each other. On the one hand, through their transparency about how enforcement judgments will be exercised, the initiatives secure greater consistency and predictability in the exercise of discretion, reducing the extent to which decisions about who will be deported appear arbitrary or random.<sup>250</sup> Curbing inconsistency and arbitrariness in the exercise of government power is commonly defended as a boon for the rule of law.<sup>251</sup> But clarity can come at a cost. Critics of the Obama initiatives worry that the very predictability of enforcement—or, more precisely, the predictability of who will be protected from enforcement—will undercut compliance with the INA and reduce the deterrent effect of the law, thereby threatening the rule of law.<sup>252</sup>

On this account, any effort to rationalize the exercise of prosecutorial discretion will necessitate a tragic choice between rule-of-law values: the value of making enforcement predictable on the one hand, and the value of legal compliance on the other.<sup>253</sup> This claim applies far more broadly than to the President's immigration actions: it amounts to an argument that no enforcement regime can simultaneously maximize both fairness and legal compliance. For the President's relief initiatives in particular, the argument suggests that critics would favor more emphasis on legal compliance, while supporters would be happy to trade reduced compliance for increased fairness.

This account poses an interesting dilemma, but we believe the choice to be illusory, not tragic, in our particular immigration setting. To make this case, we first demonstrate that we should not worry that President's transparent relief efforts will undermine legal compliance—that claim rests on fuzzy thinking about deterrence. Second, and more important and controversial, we explain why the concern rests on an incomplete understanding of modern American immigration law, according to which a perfect world is not a world of perfect compliance.

<sup>253</sup> The only way to avoid such a conflict would be to devise rule-like schemes that constrain enforcement discretion, but to somehow keep them from the public. Maintaining a gap between the system's operation and the public's beliefs about how it operates strikes us as extremely difficult. Even if were possible, it is important to note that enforcement would then only be rational, not predictable. Thus the decisions of enforcement officials might still appear arbitrary to the public.

1. The Logic of Deterrence

We have at least one mundane reason to doubt that DACA or DAPA will undermine the deterrent value of the law: the President's initiatives both apply retrospectively. They grant relief only to past immigration violators, not to future ones. Because eligibility for DAPA or DACA requires at least five years continuous residence in the country, the immigration violations of most eligible immigrants will have occurred more than five years ago, years before the President announced the policies. In fact, given estimates that the majority of the unauthorized population has been living in the United States for at least ten years,<sup>254</sup> DAPA relief may well end up helping mostly those whose immigration violations are more than a decade old.

The relief initiatives' retrospectivity make the programs very different than conventional policies of prosecutorial discretion, which should reduce concern about their impact on law's deterrent value. Most prosecutorial discretion policies set out criteria that guide decisions about which future offenders will be prosecuted for certain legal violations. The Department of Justice's recent guidance about low-level marijuana offenses provides a run-of-the-mill example. The policy tells legal subjects—you and me—that a U.S. Attorney's office is extremely unlikely to prosecute for possession of a few marijuana cigarettes. This announcement might well affect our decisions about whether to abide by the federal prohibition on marijuana possession laid out in 21 U.S.C. section 841. Indeed, the Justice Department almost certainly wanted to shape people's decision-making in this way, freeing states like Colorado and Washington to experiment with regimes that opted to decriminalize marijuana, regulating its distribution and use through noncriminal means.<sup>255</sup>

DAPA and DACA, by contrast, should not produce such a behavioral response. They are best conceptualized as exogenous legal shocks that will affect the size of the existing pool of unauthorized migrants without altering the legal regime that applies to future immigration violators (or to those who do not receive relief under the program). This feature enables the policies to drive a wedge between the value of deterrence and predictability; DHS can make enforcement more predictable without undermining future legal compliance. In fact, these programs might even improve future compliance with immigration law. With fewer resources devoted to identifying and deporting those who receive relief, DHS can redirect enforcement resources to increase the likelihood that future immigration law violators will be caught (thus increasing deterrence). DHS directives released alongside the relief policies in November 2014 reveal this strategy: DHS will devote more resources to the border, as well as to identifying those who become deportable by virtue of convictions for certain crimes.<sup>256</sup>

Critics who claim that DACA and DAPA will undermine the rule of law might resist this account of legal compliance in two ways. First, they might reject the notion that the programs grant relief for past immigration violations, arguing instead that immigration violations constitute, by their very nature, ongoing offenses. Every day an unauthorized migrant spends in the country amounts to a legal violation, and only by leaving the country can she put an end to her lawbreaking. Thus, the argument goes, even if DACA and DAPA do not affect the behavior of other migrants, they undermine legal compliance by the very migrants granted relief under the programs. Absent the programs, some number of these migrants might self-deport to bring themselves into compliance with the law, but in the presence of the program no one granted relief will do so.

For a number of reasons, we reject this conceptualization of immigration violations. We need not delve into the complexity of what it means for conduct to constitute an ongoing legal violation, because the argument contains a more basic flaw: by focusing on the individuals eligible for relief, it ignores the effect the relief programs are likely to have on legal compliance more generally. DAPA might make compliance via self-deportation less likely for those eligible for relief, but it enhances the likelihood of compliance by those not eligible for relief by raising the risk that the latter will be deported. In other words, even on an account that treats immigration status violations as ongoing violations, DACA or DAPA do not undermine the overall level of deterrence;<sup>257</sup> they simply shift the brunt of deterrence from one population to another.<sup>258</sup>

<sup>256</sup> See Memorandum from Jeh Charles Johnson, Policies for the Apprehension, Detention, and Removal of Undocumented Immigrants (Nov. 20, 2014); Memorandum from Jeh Charles Johnson, Southern Border and Approaches Campaign (Nov. 20, 2014); Memorandum from Jeh Charles Johnson, Secure Communities (Nov. 20, 2014). All of these directives are available at <http://www.dhs.gov/immigration-action> [<http://perma.cc/S2RR-G5C4>].

<sup>257</sup> Of course, the story may be more complicated, given the wealth of evidence that people do not respond to risk in the way predicted by expected utility theory. See, e.g., DANIEL KAHNEMAN, THINKING FAST, THINKING SLOW (2011); Daniel Kahneman & Amos Tversky, Prospect Theory: An Analysis of Decision Under Risk, 47 ECONOMETRICA 263 (1979). But this evidence simply gives us more reason to doubt the simple story of legal compliance told by critics of the President's relief programs.

<sup>258</sup> For immigrants' rights advocates, of course, this shift may still be troubling. Beyond the boundaries of DACA and DAPA lie many sympathetic cases, of unauthorized noncitizens with deep ties to the United States who have long-ago, minor criminal convictions, or who have not been present for the requisite time to qualify for the relief initiatives.

Second, critics might challenge the sharp analytic distinction we have made between retrospective and prospective relief. The distinction depends on the credibility of the government's commitment not to extend relief in the future to those who violate immigration law after DACA or DAPA's announcement. Commitment presents a perennial problem for amnesties and other forms of relief for past legal violations. If people begin to believe that similar relief will be granted again in the future, they might break the law in anticipation of a future grant of amnesty. If DACA grants relief to some immigrants who arrived as children, perhaps more children will attempt to enter the country in hopes of some future DACA-like program. Some commentators made precisely this claim last summer, when apprehensions of unaccompanied minors at the Texas border suddenly skyrocketed. And similar claims have been made about past immigration relief programs, most notably the legalization program that was a part of the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA), which granted green cards to nearly 2.7 million unauthorized immigrants, more than half of the then-existing unauthorized population.<sup>259</sup>

Evidence from IRCA's legalization gives us reason to doubt strong claims that immigrants will make different migration decisions simply because of a slight increase in the highly uncertain prospect of some unspecified relief years down the road. Economists studying IRCA's effect on unauthorized migration found no evidence of an increase in the flow of migrants hoping for a future program.<sup>260</sup> Moreover, in the present political environment, it seems equally possible that DACA and DAPA will serve as anchors that lower, rather than raise, the probability of more expansive relief down the road. Prior to these programs, a legislative legalization program formed a central component of the immigration reform bills introduced in Congress in 2006 and 2007 and passed by the Senate in 2013.<sup>261</sup> Most commentators think a legislative amnesty will eventually come to pass, in part because of the sheer magnitude of the unauthorized population. The open questions include when that legislative relief will ultimately come, and how far it will extend. It may be that the Obama relief initiatives will shape future legalization by limiting any program to those who have benefitted from DACA and DAPA. But we think any such predictions would be foolish. What effect, if any, DACA and DAPA will have on future reform turns on political dynamics so complex that even those who are central players in the drama, right down to the congressional leadership and President Obama himself, seem to have little idea how it will play out. Given this extreme uncertainty, we think it implausible that DACA or DAPA's influence on the prospect of relief for future immigration violators will meaningfully affect the migration decisions of prospective migrants contemplating coming to America, either by encouraging or discouraging them.

2. Underenforcement and Ex Post Screening

The retrospective nature of DACA and DAPA make them special from the perspective of deterrence. But even if the compliance critique fails at the retail level, the turn to transparent, predictable, and rule-bound enforcement strategies could still raise compliance concerns, thus implicating the tragic choice between rule of law values. For this reason, it is important to explain why the choice between transparency and compliance is illusory in light of the structure of modern American immigration law—a structure other regulatory contexts may share and that in the immigration setting transcends the Obama relief initiatives.

The argument against transparency in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion conflates two very different types of enforcement settings. In one, the legal system makes clear that the desired level of some conduct is zero. In such a setting, there ideally would be perfect compliance with the legal prohibition. But compliance might fall short of that, and the government may lack the resources to punish every single violator. In that context, secrecy about enforcement strategy can be valuable, and transparency can threaten legal compliance. The threat to compliance will be most palpable when an offense can be committed in multiple ways, or in multiple places. In such situations, publicizing what law enforcement officials will be looking for, or where they will be looking, can make it easier for would-be violators to avoid having their legal violations detected. Secrecy about law enforcement tactics, even to the extent of randomizing those tactics, can often increase compliance, both by raising the risk of detection and by creating more uncertainty about the level of risk.<sup>262</sup> For these reasons, the IRS works hard to keep its audit algorithms secret, state highway patrols do not disclose the locations of speed traps, Customs and Border Patrol frequently moves the roving checkpoints it uses along the southern border, and the CIA and other intelligence agencies resist disclosure of their surveillance tactics.<sup>263</sup>

<sup>262</sup> Risk can rise, rather than simply be redistributed across potential offenders, because strategic evasion is eliminated. See James Andreoni et al., Tax Compliance, 36 J. ECON. LIT. 818 (1998). See generally Gary Becker, Crime and Punishment: An Economic Approach, 76 J. POL. ECON. 169 (1968). For an overview of the large game-theoretic literature on these questions, see DECISION AND GAME THEORY FOR SECURITY (Radha Poovendran & Walid Saad, eds. 2014).

<sup>263</sup> This idea relates to a view in legal theory, dating back at least to Bentham, that “[a] law confining itself to the creation of an offense, and a law commanding a punishment to be administered in case of the commission of such an offense, are two distinct laws . . . .” JEREMY BENTHAM, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PRINCIPLES OF MORALS AND LEGISLATION (Dover Classics 2007). On this view, legal obligations can motivate behavior even in the absence of a sanction, and hence it is possible to speak of a legal obligation and a legal remedy as “two distinct laws.” Some deny this view,

But for reasons we already have explained in our development of the concept of de facto delegation, this account does not describe the immigration enforcement setting. In the world of de facto delegation, where exceptionally broad grounds of deportability and long-standing acceptance of high levels of unauthorized immigration have made nearly one-half of all noncitizens living in the United States formally deportable,<sup>264</sup> a perfect world is not a world of perfect enforcement.<sup>265</sup> This is so not simply because the government has limited resources—the claim around which most defenses of the President’s actions have turned. Nor is it true only because the social costs of deporting all unauthorized migrants would be enormous (though they would be). Rather, it is because immigration law’s formal prohibitions do not accurately reflect the structure of the immigrant screening system. The INA does not establish fully the contours of culpability under immigration law. Instead, our system of de facto delegation requires the Executive to assume responsibility for sorting “deserving” violators out from non-deserving ones—for making the sorts of policy judgments we defend in Part II.<sup>266</sup> The screening decisions of executive branch officials who decide which formally deportable noncitizens deserve deportation thus shape the true limits of the law.

In our view, the screening the law requires will be most fair if the Executive conducts screening universally and makes its rules transparent. Universality makes it possible to treat like cases alike, and transparency provides notice to immigrants about the actual structure of the screening system (as opposed to the formal structure of that system). We need not worry that transparency will undermine compliance with the formal screening rules of the INA, because the rules are not meant to be followed to the letter.<sup>267</sup> Instead, public behavior would track the of course: rational choice theorists of a certain sort, for example, deny that obligations ever create an independent reason for action. But for those who do not deny this possibility, there can sometimes be value in keeping certain aspects of the official remedial regime hidden from public view—to the extent possible—to prevent gaps in the remedial regime from undermining the influence of some statutory rule on behavior. See Meir Da-Cohen, Decision Rules and Conduct Rules: On Acoustic Separation in Criminal Law, 97 HARV. L. REV. 625 (1984); see also Daryl Levinson, Rights Essentialism and Remedial Equilibration, 99 COLUM. L. REV. 857 (1999). Crucially, however, this idea turns on the notion that the “true” legal norm is not itself instantiated by the remedial regime.

<sup>265</sup> Our claim, therefore, is not that an ideal world would still contain some illegal immigration. Instead, our claim is that, given the way the law is written and how it has intersected with social realities over time, we should not understand the existing immigration regime as one that demands full compliance and therefore enforcement efforts that seek to achieve full compliance.

<sup>267</sup> As we explained in Part II, in making this claim about de facto delegation, we do not mean to suggest that Congress specifically intended to overdraw the law and assign the President the authority to screen. Instead, it is an observation about the evolution and expansion of a legal regime to cover such a broad swath of conduct that the Executive becomes obligated to do so. It is a claim about the social meaning and ex post acceptance of a system as it has evolved and been constructed by Congress and the Executive in tandem. As we also explained in Part II, the Supreme Court in Arizona v. United States openly acknowledged this conception of executive power by highlighting the central screening system established by executive discretion, instead of the (overbroad) criteria articulated in the statute itself. The Obama relief initiatives aid this objective through transparency.

Other areas of the law share this structure whereby the legally desirable level of an action is not zero, and according to which overbroad laws have the effect of empowering public officials to screen for culpable violations from among a larger pool of formal violators.<sup>268</sup> Consider criminal law. Bill Stuntz has argued that it has a just such a structure: legislators draw substantive rules of criminal liability to sweep in far more persons than are deserving of punishment, effectively delegating power to prosecutors and police to sift through the universe of violators, screening for those who are worthy of punishment.<sup>269</sup> In such a system, a rationalized, predictable, and transparent system of prosecutorial discretion promotes the equal treatment of similarly situated defendants without undermining compliance with the “true” criminal law norms that the system seeks to enforce. If we think that low-level marijuana possession by a person with no other criminal record should not be punished, then we should hope that judgment applies to all cases, not to a random subset of violators. And we would not worry that publicizing the policy would undermine legal compliance, because the very point of the exercise of discretion would be to communicate that possession under those circumstances does not deserve punishment.

We recognize, of course, that critics of the Obama relief initiatives, in Congress and in the commentariat, might dispute our account of the modern structure of immigration law—we view this claim as our most controversial and contestable one. The self-deportation strategy advanced by opponents of illegal immigration reflects a total compliance world-view leavened by the reality of limited enforcement resources. Measures that induce self-deportation become necessary in a world of limited resources precisely in order to achieve the total compliance goals of the system. But the core of our argument here is that these critics operate with the wrong understanding of the nature of underenforcement in immigration law—one role that executive branch discretion plays in defining the actual content of immigration law. See supra text accompanying notes 82-84; see also Cox, Enforcement Redundancy, supra note 31, at 48-55; Rodriguez, supra note 128 (discussing the ambiguous social meaning of unauthorized status and exploring the concept of sociological as opposed to legal membership).

<sup>268</sup> The case that the formal rules embodied in the immigration code sweep in far more people than deserve deportation can be made in two ways: as an interpretive claim about the structure of modern immigration law, or as a purely normative claim. Our claim here is primarily interpretive, building on our historical account of the development of immigration law and the de facto delegation of screening authority to the Executive—a delegation which presumes that not all those in formal violation of the law should be deported. This is the sort of claim endorsed by the Supreme Court in United States v. Arizona. But our account also undoubtedly has important normative implications—about the questions of institutional design we are focused on in this Article, as well about broader issues we have touched on in earlier work and continue to develop.

that ignores the actual history and practice of immigration law and puts them on the wrong side of the Supreme Court in Arizona. Supporters of DACA and DAPA have re-enforced this confusion about underenforcement's significance; their persistent focus on resource constraints as both a necessary (and sufficient?) condition for the exercise of broad deportation discretion promotes the misconception that, in the absence of resource constraints, the Executive's duty would be to enforce against all violators (save perhaps for the occasional exercise of humanitarian discretion). Budget constraints are ubiquitous. But the structural delegation of screening authority present in immigration law—and some other areas like criminal law—is not.

In choosing rules over standards, centralization over diffusion, and transparency over secrecy, the Obama relief initiatives highlight some key debates over how best to organize the modern bureaucracy. In their particular context, these choices not only make acceptable structural trade-offs, they actually promote rule of law values and accountable and constrained executive power. Far from striking a blow on behalf of the imperial presidency, the relief initiatives represent responsible uses of the enforcement power, even as they advance the President's political agenda. Any unseemliness of the latter does not detract from the value of the former.

Of course, in offering this conceptual alternative to the faithful agent framework we reject in Part II, the question becomes what sorts of efforts to structure the enforcement power would give rise to constitutional concerns. Can we imagine any limits on the way in which the Executive institutionalizes its discretion or makes the inevitable trade-offs among rule of law values? We turn to these most difficult questions in Part IV below.

But before developing our account of limiting principles, we pause to address one last, frequently heard claim about the way in which DACA and DAPA institutionalize relief loosely related to our arguments in this Part. The claim is as follows: by choosing rule-like criteria for relief, by centralizing control over the application of those criteria, and by establishing a transparent application process, the Obama administration has conferred on DACA and DAPA recipients a promise of non-enforcement that differs in kind from a mere guideline that de-prioritizes removal on the basis of certain characteristics. This claim—that there is an important substantive difference between the form of relief provided by these programs and ordinary prosecutorial discretion—rests at the heart of the Texas district court's decision to enjoin DAPA and the expansion of DACA. In the words of the district court, the programs provide the benefit of “three years immunity from the law.”<sup>270</sup> At another point the decision describes the benefit as the conferral of “legal presence status.”<sup>271</sup> In other words, the relief initiatives confer new legal benefits on recipients <sup>270</sup> See Texas v. United States, No. 1:14-CV-254 (D. Tex. 2015) (memorandum opinion and order granting preliminary injunction).

<sup>271</sup> See id.; see also McConnell, supra note 147 (arguing that the President has attempted to create “a new legal status for aliens unlawfully present under the terms of the Immigration Act” and rather than simply decline to prosecute them.<sup>272</sup> Providing these legal benefits, in the critics' view, departs from any coherent understanding of prosecutorial discretion and exceeds the authority of executive branch officials.<sup>273</sup>

This argument appears to turn on the legal consequences for immigrants (or other regulatory subjects) of institutionalizing enforcement discretion in particular ways. Its subtext might also be that the relief policies' beneficiaries do not deserve an open and notorious relief from prosecution, even if they might escape prosecution as the result of case-by-case choices. To the extent this argument depends on the claim that DAPA and DACA recipients receive a legally binding promise that they will not be deported for three years,<sup>274</sup> the argument is mistaken. The administration has made no such promises.<sup>275</sup> As a formal matter, the promise entailed by the relief initiatives is no more a legal entitlement than the promise that would have accompanied an "individualized" grant of deferred action in the years prior to DACA. While grants of deferred action have in the past been made for fixed terms, and sometimes for indefinite periods, these grants have never been understood as legal entitlements. As with any other instance of prosecutorial discretion, executive branch officials remain free to reverse course and charge a person previously granted deferred action. Of course, in practice, such reversals were rare historically, and we acknowledge that Jeh Johnson almost certainly will not reverse course next month and order ICE agents to initiate removal proceedings against those who have been granted relief under DACA. As a matter of law, however, this reality does not convert a permissible non-enforcement decision into an impermissible grant of a legal benefit. If it did, grants of prosecutorial discretion by criminal prosecutors would be widely unlawful, as it is often clear in the case of such grants that criminal emphasizing that the President's actions are not a "routine application of 'prosecutorial discretion'" but rather the conferral of benefits such as "work permits and welfare without statutory authority and notice-and-comment rulemaking").

<sup>272</sup> While we focus on here on the purported benefit of legal status, critics also claim that the work permits that accompany a grant of relief amount to an unauthorized legal benefit. The difficulty with this argument is that federal regulations, adopted more than two decades ago through notice-and-comment rulemaking, authorized the Attorney General (now the Secretary of DHS) to grant work permits to noncitizens who receive deferred action. See 8 C.F.R. § 274.12. Bizarrely, this regulation is never cited by the Texas district court. For a thorough explanation of this issue, see Legomsky, Written Testimony (Feb. 25, 2015), supra note 44, at 16-18; OLC Op, supra note 7, at 21-22.

<sup>273</sup> Exactly how the "benefits" conferral exceeded the authority of those officials is unclear in the district court opinion. The court held only that the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) prohibited the provision of these benefits in the absence of notice-and-comment rulemaking. See id. But the court's reasoning appears to entail the much more consequential conclusion that the President violated Article II by conferring such benefits on immigrants under the guise of exercising prosecutorial discretion.

<sup>274</sup> Price describes this as a prospective license to violate the law. See Price, supra note 11, at 760.

<sup>275</sup> As an aside, it is also far from clear that the Constitution prohibits such promises. If Article II were understood to do so, it would require that we treat the ubiquitous practice of granting immunity to criminal defendants as either unconstitutional or unenforceable.

justice officials have no intention of pursuing changes in the future for the conduct at issue.

We could try to rescue the “benefits” critique by recasting it in a functional rather than formal light (though critics themselves have cast it in a formalist way). We could say that the core of the benefits claim is not that the deferred action granted amounts to a legal entitlement, but instead that, for all practical intents and purposes, DACA and DAPA provide relief we know will be more durable than ordinary decisions to defer or forgo enforcement. This durability, critics might argue, applies not only within the current administration, but also beyond it, as it would be politically very costly for a new President, regardless of party, to begin removing in significant numbers the beneficiaries of DACA and DAPA who will have developed strong reliance interests. On this account, the practical entrenchment likely to arise from the President’s actions separates constitutional exercises of prosecutorial discretion from unconstitutional ones.

These programs may in fact be durable, but that would not distinguish DACA and DAPA from earlier exercises of immigration enforcement discretion. Whereas President Obama’s initiatives promise only three years of relief, noncitizens granted deferred action in the past have in some cases been granted indefinite relief—relief that spanned more than one administration. And, as a theoretical matter, it also seems plausible that the institutionalization of relief in high-level agency decisions will ultimately undermine the durability of relief over time. A single decision of a future administration could reverse the non-enforcement decisions with respect to millions of noncitizens.<sup>276</sup> Nothing of this sort would have been possible in under the regime that preceded DACA and DAPA. The literature analyzing centralization appreciates this possibility, emphasizing the fact that agencies become more responsive and policies less entrenched—not the other way around—as decision-making becomes centralized in high-level officials who are less subject to the slow-to-change culture of an institution.<sup>277</sup>

As a descriptive matter, therefore, we are skeptical of the claim that DACA and DAPA entrench nonenforcement promises to a greater degree than other forms of enforcement discretion. More important, we see no reason why the practical durability of the policy should be constitutionally relevant: there is no plausible constitutional theory of which we are aware under which a promise not to prosecute becomes unconstitutional whenever that promise might be politically durable.

IV. WITHER LIMITING PRINCIPLES?

As we show in Part II, principles to limit the exercise of enforcement discretion based on substantive factors grounded in congressional priorities will be elusive across many statutory schemes, especially as those schemes become more reticulated. This reality is part of the reason why the “parade of horrors” invoked by many critics of the Obama relief initiatives is not so much a series of hypotheticals about a dystopian post-DACA future as a simple description of the actual history of many regulatory arenas. Ronald Reagan dramatically scaled back environmental and antitrust enforcement. George W. Bush transformed the enforcement culture of the Environmental Protection Agency, altering threshold regulatory requirements for new source review under the Clean Air Act and abandoning investigations either underway when he took office or that had been commenced under the pre-existing legal regime.<sup>278</sup> His administration also nearly shuttered the Department of Justice office that pursues structural reform of police misconduct,<sup>279</sup> and the Voting Rights section of his Civil Rights Division filed no lawsuits alleging voting discrimination against minority voters for several consecutive years.<sup>280</sup> Indeed, Eric Holder came into office as Attorney General promising to restore the stature and power of the Division. The first chair of the Securities and Exchange Commission appointed by President Obama immediately ended a Bush administration pilot program that required enforcement staff to seek permission from the Commission before negotiating a civil monetary penalty against a public company—a policy that delayed the enforcement process.<sup>281</sup>

These shifts in enforcement policy, while perhaps dramatic, simply reflect the consequences of politics and presidential elections. Though it might be magnanimous and perhaps even judicious for the President to tread lightly when making enforcement judgments, in order to set good precedents for his or her successors who will have distinct ideological preferences, we think it at least as likely that it would be foolishly high minded. Exercising the enforcement power necessitates making value judgments, particularly in circumstances where the laws being enforced either reflect a variety of compromises made by the enacting Congress or leave the Executive Branch with wide-ranging discretion in implementation. And as we explained in Part II, there are reasons to value rather than lament the scope of judgment the enforcement power entails—reasons that parallel, in many ways, the defense of delegation of vast rulemaking and therefore policymaking power within the modern administrative state.

Yet the inevitability and desirability of Presidential priority setting does not mean that the President can exercise the enforcement power without constraint. In the absence of express and specific statutory grants of direction, we would still expect the Executive to abide by constitutional norms that demand that the exercise of coercive power be well supervised and accountable. But those limiting principles will be too difficult to formulate based on substantive priorities. Instead, we should think of them in terms of form of constraint on the way the Executive institutionalizes enforcement priorities. Understanding the choices at stake in the institutionalization of prosecutorial discretion, as we have presented them, can help us begin to identify when the form discretion takes might raise red flags as a matter of constitutional law.

To say that such limiting principles exist is not to say that they will always be judicially manageable. Some might be easily embodied in doctrine, but others will be difficult to formulate into clear legal rules. For constitutional scholars who believe the very definition of a “limiting principle” is that it must be amenable to enforcement by an Article III judge, our view may be unsatisfying. But we believe it would be a mistake to tangle up debates about the existence of constitutional limiting principles with longstanding disagreements about the extent to which constitutional norms must be judicially enforceable.

In what follows, we begin by identifying the sorts of limiting principles that might apply to the exercise of the enforcement power. But the inquiry into constraint need not end there. Even if broad use of the enforcement power according to executive judgment is constitutional, and even though it will be difficult to conclude that a particular rule-of-law trade-off made by the Executive crosses a constitutional line, we can still evaluate either the arrangement between the branches or Executive decisions regarding how to structure its power on the merits. In other words, it would be a mistake to limit the analysis of the enforcement power to the constitutional register, and we therefore close by considering what might be deficient with the Obama relief initiatives and the state of affairs that produced them, as a matter of more general legal and political theory.

A. Current Constraining Principles

Constraints on the President's authority to determine how to institutionalize discretion and structure hierarchies and decision-making processes within the Executive Branch could arise from a number of sources, many of which have nothing to do with constitutional limiting principles. First, as we discussed in Parts II and III, Congress possesses a variety of familiar tools to constrain discretion, though some will be easier to employ than others. Congress certainly could place constraints on the substance of discretionary choices. As we note in Part II when describing how enforcement judgments help construct the regulatory domain, congressional statutes themselves place limits on the bases of enforcement. The President could not, for example, declare as a ground of removal an offense Congress has not listed in the Code. Congress also could draft statutory prohibitions against certain exercises of discretion<sup>282</sup> or use its appropriations power to shape enforcement choices, though we have discussed the limits of the latter<sup>283</sup> and are skeptical the former approach would be a good one to adopt with frequency, given the affirmative value of executive policymaking through enforcement we articulate in Part II.

Congress also could use institutional design and oversight in tandem to constrain discretion. It could limit the President's capacity to supervise officials' discretionary judgments; for example, Congress could require that particular low-level adjudicators, such as administrative law judges, make certain decisions without interference from agency leadership. The development of statutory protections for civil service employees has similar historical roots; those protections promoted the professionalization of government employment and insulated employees from the pressure of patronage politics.<sup>284</sup> Congress might also seek to diffuse power to make agencies more responsive to individual members of Congress and oversight committees through day-to-day, informal interactions. To be sure, strategies of this sort might be difficult to launch, given the fraught legislative process. But Congress could, at the very least, use politically motivated hearings and appeals to the press to

<sup>282</sup> We acknowledge the existence of a debate concerning whether Congress can direct the President's prosecutorial judgments. See, e.g., In re Aiken County, 725 F.3d 255, n.11 (D.C. Cir. 2013) ("[T]he President may decline to follow a law that purports to require the Executive Branch to prosecute certain offenses or offenders. Such a law would interfere with the President's Article II prosecutorial discretion."). But while it seems clear that the direction to prosecute particular individuals would raise serious constitutional concerns, we would not read Article II as containing inherent authority to exercise discretion such that Congress could not extinguish that discretion—a power we think included in its very power to legislate.

<sup>284</sup> Jon Michaels, in fact, analogizes the civil service to the constraints imposed on government power by the judiciary in the Madisonian separation of powers framework and argues that modern trends toward privatization pose a worrying threat to this essential source of constraint of power. See Michaels, supra note 172, at 540-47.

advance its point of view in a way that might create political pressure on the Executive to change its behavior.<sup>285</sup>

But our primary interest here is not in the myriad political and institutional forces that constrain the President as a matter of fact. We focus instead on the ways in which the Constitution itself will sometimes directly constrain how executive officials institutionalize enforcement discretion.<sup>286</sup> Constraints can crop up along any of the three dimensions we identified in Part III. Take the choice between rules, standards, and unfettered discretion. Sometimes the Constitution requires government-by-rules; other times it prohibits their use. For example, the First Amendment sometimes requires that executive branch officials make decisions pursuant to rules clearly specified ex ante, in order to constrain executive discretionary judgments about permitting decisions and the like that could result in impermissible discrimination.<sup>287</sup> In contrast, the Due Process Clause sometimes prohibits the use of highly structured decision-making rules, requiring that an adjudicator retain discretion to take account of any evidence or arguments offered by an individual claimant.<sup>288</sup>

It could also be the case that particular choices between rules versus standards involve impermissible trade-offs among rule of law values. These limits generally will

<sup>285</sup> See Barry R. Weingast & Mark J. Moran, Bureaucratic Discretion or Congressional Control? Regulatory Policymaking by the Federal Trade Commission, 91 J. POL. ECON. 765, 768-69, 793 (1983) (showing how members of Congress used hearings and the threat of sanctions in the late 1970s to induce changes in FTC policy); see also Elena Kagan, Presidential Administration, 114 HARV. L. REV. 2245, 2348-49 (2001) (arguing that presidential involvement in bureaucratic decisionmaking stimulates congressional oversight); Daniel C. Richman, Federal Criminal Law, Congressional Delegation, and Enforcement Discretion, 46 UCLA L. REV. 757, 789-93 (1999) (arguing that congressional oversight hearings are particularly effective in cases of prosecutorial discretion, where the Executive would otherwise operate in secrecy).

<sup>286</sup> One type of constraint on which we do not focus, but which is obviously very important, is constraint imposed by rights-regarding constitutional provisions like the First or Fourteenth Amendment. Even in a world where congressional priorities do not limit the substantive criteria on which the executive bases enforcement, the Constitution does prohibit the use of some criteria. So, for example, the President could no more restrict grants of deferred action on the basis of race than could a federal prosecutor use race as a factor in charging decisions. See also Legomsky, Written Testimony (Feb. 25, 2015), supra note 44, at 15 (“particular priorities can’t . . . otherwise violate equal protection of other individual constitutional rights”). The Executive, of course, routinely makes discretionary judgments in the immigration arena based on nationality. Grants of temporary protected status and deferred enforced departure, for example, are made for groups of non-citizens based on their nationality, to provide protection for persons from countries beset by environmental disasters or civil strife or where the President’s foreign policy would be undermined by their return. See supra notes 18 & 25 (discussing TPS and DED). In the main, this line does not present a constitutional concern, even though correlations between race and nationality abound. But were the President to draw nationality classifications in a manner that suggested an underlying race-based motivation, we believe it would be appropriate for critics and even courts to decry the President’s actions using the language of constitutionality.

be hard to characterize as hard-and-fast constitutional requirements as opposed to as features of a theory of constitutionalism. But certain criticisms aimed at particular institutional design choices would sound in constitutional concerns, even though a court would be unlikely to strike them down. If, for example, the President's initiative permitted any non-citizen to apply for relief but then left the judgment entirely to the whims of adjudicators, the loss of supervision resulting from this standards-based approach might, depending on the practice of the adjudicators, amount to a loss that cannot be offset by the limited if non-existent benefits of individualized, fine-grained decision-making. We could describe this as a constitutionally irresponsible choice, even if it would be difficult to describe as unconstitutional.

We could similarly analyze the choice to centralize or diffuse power. Centralization designed to facilitate preferential treatment of the President's cronies provides one potential example of constitutionally problematic institutionalization. Even a centralization initiative designed to serve partisan goals, which ordinarily might be unexceptional, could present a source of constitutional concern in a context in which custom and constitutional norms demand independence. The centralized and politicized hiring of immigration judges in the Ashcroft Justice Department, for instance, contravened civil service regulations and customs surrounding the hiring of officials otherwise removable by the Attorney General.<sup>289</sup>

The tradeoffs between transparency and secrecy also give rise to principles that might constrain Presidential choices about how to institutionalize discretion. If the structure and integrity of a given enforcement domain depend on self-compliance by regulated parties, then the costs of transparency regarding enforcement priorities might be so high as to be deemed impermissible. In the tax arena, for example, the enforcement machinery depends heavily on the in terrorem effect of legal regulation; the system's goal is maximal compliance with the law, and so it is crucial for the IRS to keep hidden from view its enforcement priorities, in order to maintain public incentives for widespread compliance. If the IRS were to announce that a portion of the Code simply would not be enforced because of the Service's scarce resources, legal compliance would be undermined for little benefit and for arguably questionable reasons (perhaps to curry favor with a tax-skeptical public).<sup>290</sup> In such a circumstance, the charge of "abdication" would have bite, because enforcement policy would reflect less an attempt to better structure the location of discretion than an effort to undermine the law itself.

Again, it bears emphasizing that these limits we imagine may not be judicially enforceable, and we have not conceptualized them as doctrinal principles. Defining them as doctrinal rules and then mobilizing them would require the formulation of comprehensive and easily contested theories of executive power unmoored from constitutional text and with ambiguous relationships to constitutional practice. As we emphasize throughout Part III, we ultimately believe we should be reluctant to constitutionalize the internal structures of the Executive Branch, given the complex trade-offs among rule-of-law values that must be made when an administration seeks to organize and wield its power.

<sup>289</sup> By contrast, Gillian Metzger, for example, argues that the failure to supervise the exercise of discretion can in some circumstances amount to unconstitutional abdication of presidential responsibilities. See Metzger, The Constitutional Duty to Supervise, supra note 173, at 1874-86.

<sup>290</sup> As we explain in Part III, given the structure of de facto delegation, legal compliance as a value has far less relevance in the immigration setting.

The difficulty of devising rules of constraint from a set of general principles does help explain the appeal of the Office of Legal Counsel's substantive approach, or the prophylactic, bright-line framings of critics who have tried to draw the conceptual distinctions we reject in Part III between individual and categorical judgments, or between non-prosecution and the granting of benefits. But as we hope we have shown in Parts II and III, the lawyerly appeal of these frameworks cannot save them as descriptive or normative accounts of the scope of executive authority. The theoretical framework we have offered as an alternative may not result in clear lines around the enforcement power, but it does provide a vocabulary well suited to legal conversations about constitutional norms with which we (scholars, lawmakers, internal executive watchdogs) can assess the merits of executive branch practice.

B. Future Discipline

The fact that the President acted lawfully and reasonably when announcing DACA and DAPA does not mean that our current institutional arrangements are ideal. The two principals model of immigration policymaking is the one we have inherited, and we show in Part II that important benefits flow from this model. But we do not maintain that the current regulatory structure is optimal, and current interbranch dynamics do present downsides. We therefore close by considering various ways of improving the constitutional and theoretical grounding of the President's enforcement power over immigration law.<sup>291</sup>

1. Meta: The Process of Institutionalization

Let's start with the development of the Obama relief initiatives themselves. As we have argued, they represent transparency-enhancing and regularizing improvements on the status quo that preceded them—a world in which the Morton

<sup>291</sup> In some sense, this inquiry resembles the debate in the foreign affairs domain over whether and how Congress should authorize the President to use force against a national security threat. Even if the President's authority is not in dispute (and it often is), reasons that reflect constitutional values still exist for him to seek authorization from Congress, and genuine debate can be had over how best to unleash but yet constrain the President's authority to use force. See, e.g., Robert Chesney et al., A Statutory Framework for Next-Generation Terrorist Threats, HOOVER INST. (2013), <http://media.hoover.org/sites/default/files/documents/Statutory-Framework-for-Next-Generation-Terrorist-Threats.pdf> [<http://perma.cc/F8MG-PE6M>]; Ryan Goodman, Obama's Forever War Starts Now, FOREIGN POL'Y (Feb. 12, 2015), <http://foreignpolicy.com/2015/02/12/obamas-forever-war-starts-now-aumf-isis-islamic-state> [<http://perma.cc/6KKG-PUFN>].

Memos and other guidance documents provided far too little information about how the Executive actually exercised its significant screening authority, and far too little supervision of line-level officials. Yet while the Obama initiatives themselves are transparent, the process that produced them was opaque. Mobilized interest groups may well have informed the ultimate shape of the initiatives, but there were no formal avenues for public input into the policymaking process. The policies were drafted and vetted only within the Executive Branch and its self-defined spheres of influence.

One means of addressing this flaw might be through the Administrative Procedures Act (APA). The notion that DACA and DAPA count as legislative rules subject to the APA's notice and comment requirement, rather than counting as general statements of policy, led the district court in Texas to declare that the administration had violated the APA.<sup>292</sup> That decision remains pending before the Fifth Circuit as we write, though the court appears poised to affirm the district court, teeing up for the Supreme Court the APA issue, if not the underlying constitutional question.<sup>293</sup> In denying the government's request for a stay of the injunction<sup>294</sup> and <sup>292</sup> For an elaboration of this holding, see supra notes 18 & 99. For skepticism by others of the district court's conclusion, see, e.g., Cass R. Sunstein, Texas Misjudges Obama on Immigration, BLOOMBERG VIEW (Feb. 17, 2015, 12:56 PM), <http://www.bloomberglaw.com/articles/2015-02-17/what-the-judge-got-wrong-about-obama-s-immigration-plan> [<http://perma.cc/M8E7-BBSR>].

<sup>293</sup> If the Fifth Circuit were to uphold the district court's injunction of the Obama relief initiatives, we believe there would be a strong case for Supreme Court review, given that the court of appeals would have enjoined the nationwide implementation of an important federal program, based on legal conclusions in a doctrinally muddy area. Though not creating an actual circuit split, the courts of appeals cases rejecting challenges to DACA on standing and jurisdictional grounds might also weigh in the Court's consideration of whether the sorts of issues implicated in DAPA require Court attention. For a discussion of those cases, see supra notes 113-114 and accompanying text. In a case challenging the state of Arizona's refusal to issue drivers' licenses to DACA recipients, the Ninth Circuit recently requested briefing on the constitutionality of DACA, since the state defends its policy in part on the claim that DACA was unlawful. This litigation, therefore might also generate disagreement in the courts of appeals. See Arizona Dream Act Coalition v. Brewer, Order No. 15-15307 (July 17, 2015).

<sup>294</sup> See Texas v. United States, No. 15-40238 (5th Cir. May 26, 2015). In denying the government's request for a stay of the district court's injunction pending appeal, the Fifth Circuit concluded that the United States had not shown that it was likely to succeed on the merits of its claims, including that Texas lacked standing, id. at 8, that the INA, and the fact that the policy constituted the exercise of prosecutorial discretion, precluded judicial review, id. at 23-30, and that DAPA did not constitute a legislative rule requiring notice and comment, id. at 31-39. The court found that the government had not made a strong showing that the district court erred in concluding that DAPA did not leave agency officials with genuine discretion, id. at 36. In its assessment of whether judicial review was available, the panel's analysis suggests deep skepticism of the government's effort to characterize DAPA as the mere exercise of prosecutorial discretion. It even points to provisions in the INA that would suggest that the Secretary's discretion to provide relief based on humanitarian concerns is limited to specific cases, id. at 28, and observes that "[a]gainst that background, we would expect to find an explicit delegation of authority to implement DAPA—a program that makes 4.3 million otherwise removable aliens eligible for lawful presence, work authorization, and associated benefits—but no such provision exists," id.

during oral arguments on the merits,<sup>295</sup> two different panels (with overlapping membership) appeared skeptical of the federal government's case (though one judge subjected Texas' claims to withering criticism, as well).

As a matter of existing administrative law doctrine, we would be skeptical of this outcome (though, to be frank, the case law attempting to sort legislative from nonlegislative rules is a mess, and this case could force a crystallization of that doctrine).<sup>296</sup> But as a matter of principle, the claim that the Obama relief policies would have benefited from more procedural formality, or transparent public input, should be taken seriously. The administration's defenders have tried valiantly to frame the relief initiatives as entirely ordinary. But this framing obscures the <sup>296</sup>While legislative rules doctrine is (in)famously incoherent, courts considering whether an agency action constitutes a legislative rule tend to focus on the following question: does the agency action create new legal obligations or benefits for the regulated party? See, e.g., Nat'l Mining Ass'n v. McCarthy, 758 F.3d 243, 251-52 (D.C. Cir. 2014). As John Manning and others have noted, this question cannot be answered without some account of how one distinguishes interpretation from lawmaking and, ultimately, without an account of what constitutes law. Formalist and functionalist approaches to these questions produce dramatically different results, and that is part of what accounts for the doctrinal confusion and indeterminacy. Despite this confusion, however, the cases on which the Texas district court relied are clearly inapposite. In nearly all of those cases, an agency tasked with enforcing a vague statutory obligation—often one in which the statute required the regulated party to engage in “reasonable” behavior—cached out that obligation in a guidance document that created a precise, often numerical standard. See, e.g., Gen. Elec. Co. v. EPA, 290 F.3d 377 (D.C. Cir. 2002); Cmty. Nutrition Inst. v. Young, 818 F.2d 943 (D.C. Cir. 1987); Natural Resources Defense Council v. EPA, 643 F.3d 311 (D.C. Cir. 2011); Appalachian Power Co. v. EPA, 208 F.3d 1015 (D.C. Cir. 2000). In each case, the court concluded that the agency had created new legal obligations—mandatory rules of conduct—that were not themselves embodied in the statute. And for that reason the court held that the agency action must be treated as a legislative rule, regardless of how the agency itself had characterized it.

While these decisions do sometimes speak about whether the agency has “bound itself” to a course of conduct, the cases are not—contrary to the suggestion of the Texas District Court—focused on the internal organization of the agency independent of the question whether the agency has created new legal obligations. Under these cases, the fact that an agency directive “binds” low-level employees, by requiring them to comply with rules issued by their superiors, is not itself sufficient to render an agency action a legislative rule. Issuing rule-like commands to subordinates is consequential for the legislative rules calculus only insofar as those commands create or alter the legal obligations of the regulated parties.

If courts take that approach to DACA and DAPA, then there can be little doubt that they are not legislative rules. As we explained earlier, the President's relief initiatives do not create or alter the legal rights or obligations of immigrants. In contrast to the D.C. Circuit cases discussed above, they do not clarify or move some otherwise vague or shifting boundary between lawful and unlawful immigration status. That formal boundary is plain from the immigration code itself: all of the immigrants eligible for relief under the programs are currently in violation of immigration law, and they will remain in violation of immigration law even if they receive deferred action pursuant to one of those programs. Nothing in DACA or DAPA itself changes their legal status, and it has been well understood for a half century that the grant of deferred action itself does not confer any legal benefit.

innovative nature of DAPA and DACA that we described in Part III—a characteristic that, when combined with the scale of the programs, mark them as significant acts of policy-making by the Executive, much as the historical precedents the administration cites were. DACA and DAPA may not confer formal legal status, but they would enable millions of unauthorized immigrants to work and further entrench their interests in and expectations of remaining in the United States. The Obama relief initiatives thus significantly increase the political and humanitarian costs of removing this population at some future point.

Significant policy-making of this sort would benefit from greater public scrutiny and involvement, if only to enhance the legitimacy of the President's initiatives.<sup>297</sup> Open input also could inform the administration's judgments on questions such as the relevant criteria, the scale of the program, and the range of "benefits" that should flow from the granting of relief.<sup>298</sup> Such public deliberation would facilitate a central goal underlying the APA of increasing the accountability of the policymaking process while also bolstering public confidence in the measures ultimately adopted.

These potential benefits do not mean, however, that courts should overhaul existing legislative rules jurisprudence in order to force programs like DACA and DAPA to go through notice-and-comment rulemaking, as the litigants in the Fifth Circuit aim to do. The protracted multi-year nature of modern rulemaking would likely have made such a process impossible from the administration's point of view,<sup>299</sup> especially to the extent both DACA and DAPA were timed to maximize the Chen, The Legitimacy of Executive Action on Immigration and State Cooperation: Deferred Action and Drivers' Licenses (unpublished manuscript on file with authors) (2015).

<sup>299</sup> In July 2015, DHS issued an advanced notice of proposed rulemaking and invited comments on a decision to expand another program designed to stabilize the status of unauthorized immigrants. See Expansion of Provisional Unlawful Presence Waivers of Inadmissibility, Advanced Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, RIN 1615-AC03, http://www.uscis.gov/sites/default/files/USCIS/Laws/FedReg/Draft\_1-601A\_Unlawful\_Presence\_Expansion\_NPRM\_Clean\_071415.pdf. The original program permitted certain immediate relatives of U.S. citizens to apply for waivers from the ground of inadmissibility related to unauthorized presence from the United States, rather than continue to require that they travel abroad, which had been the previous practice and not only led to lengthy separations from families due to processing delays, but also meant those noncitizens ran the risk of being denied a waiver and then being barred from entering the United States for three or ten years in light of INA 212(a)(9)(B)(i). The 2015 proposed rule would substantially expand those eligible to apply for such waivers by opening the process to anyone eligible for a visa and thus substantially counters the disincentives created by the the three and ten year bars in INA 212(a)(9)(B)(i). The administration's decision to invite comment on this proposal may provide some evidence as to how difficult and protracted a notice-and-comment period would be for DAPA, though we suspect even this proposal would spark far less controversy than the deferred action programs.

political payoff of the announcements.<sup>300</sup> Perhaps interest group meetings in the White House were all that could reasonably have been expected by way of public input into an initiative of this sort. But that points to a more general dilemma posed by modern administrative law, where the choice too often is between a notice-and-comment regime widely seen as cumbersome and no procedural formality at all.<sup>301</sup>

Faced with this choice, the incentives of executive branch officials have predictably produced more and more informality in the sphere of administrative action. In a way, it would have been shocking had the development of DACA and DAPA unfolded any differently. Nonetheless, the absence of manageable channels for public input highlights the basic failure of administrative law to address the central role that enforcement discretion plays in important regulatory arenas. Some form of public input into the development of enforcement priorities with more formality than private meetings convened by the Executive and less than notice-and-comment rulemaking would be a valuable contribution to regulatory spheres, such as immigration, in which the enforcement power drives not only the application of the law, but also the politics and substantive policy behind the issue.

2. Prosecutorial Discretion in a Second-Best Regulatory Environment

The final fundamental problem that remains to be addressed is the need for DACA and DAPA in the first place. As we have chronicled here and in previous work, de facto delegation gives rise to an asymmetrical screening power on the President's part—giving him much more power at the back end of the system than the front. While exclusion and deportation are clearly substitute mechanisms for screening migrants, restricting most regulatory innovation to the ex post screening environment leaves us stuck in a second-best regulatory environment.

If the President is to have primary responsibility for the structure of the immigrant screening system, he should be able to determine the optimal mix of ex ante and ex post screening mechanisms. A better-designed system would prevent such a large pool of potentially removable non-citizens from arising in the first place, reducing the need for law enforcement and therefore the sort of policy-making through enforcement that can tend toward the opaque and create the impression, if not the reality, of arbitrary decision-making. In other words, the fact that policymaking through enforcement can play a desirable function within a scheme of separated powers does not mean that alternatives forms of more transparent policymaking are not preferable.<sup>302</sup>

<sup>300</sup> The administration announced DACA in the summer before the 2012 presidential election, for example, leading some commentators to conclude that the President's quest for re-election and a strong showing among Latino voters motivated the decision.

We can imagine numerous ways to address this problem of an overly large enforcement realm—eliminating or narrowing some of the grounds of removability and scaling up border enforcement represent two at opposite ends of the political spectrum (and each addresses a different source of de facto delegation). We doubt either will be especially effective, however, as means of curbing the enforcement power. Whereas the former likely will have an effect primarily on the margins (at least as long as unauthorized presence remains a ground of removal), the latter offers a blunt instrument for reducing the deportable pool and only magnifies the unreviewed power of the prosecutor by focusing enforcement where executive power is at its most robust and judicial review and due process norms at their weakest. What is more, the pathologies of de facto delegation have not arisen solely from the legal structure of immigration law. As we emphasized earlier, intersection of this legal structure with powerful social and demographic forces has produced the current state of affairs. For those whose answer to our dilemma of de facto delegation would be to prevent the unauthorized pool from arising in the first place, we suggest such thinking is likely wishful.

For all of these reasons, we have advocated in the past delegating greater ex ante screening authority to the Executive to enable the government to respond to demographic and labor market factors in a way that responds to the external pressures that have contributed to de facto delegation.<sup>303</sup> Seen in light of our analysis in this Article concerning the role of the President as independent policy maker, this option should seem normatively attractive.<sup>304</sup> An ex ante process not only would make room for far more significant public input than an ex post enforcement regime—even one as transparent as DACA and DAPA. It also would channel executive power into less coercive forms that necessarily attend the operation of a law enforcement bureaucracy. We happen to be at a moment in time when net illegal migration appears to have approached zero, and so the need for such ex ante

<sup>302</sup> A related problem has been the proliferation of states of legal limbo created through executive action. As compensation for its lack of control over ex ante screening and to address exigencies that have arisen but that the Code does not address, the Executive has created a variety of immigration non-statutes like deferred action that leave their recipients at the mercy of executive discretion. Compared to a world in which the Executive has not wielded such authority, this increasing complexity can seem like a positive development. But it is less than ideal. For a thorough articulation of these various executive-created statuses, see Geoffrey Heeren, The Status of Nonstatus, 64.5 AM. U. L. REV. (forthcoming 2015), <http://ssrn.com/abstract=2560931> [<http://perma.cc/9PE9-D53S>].

<sup>304</sup> Of course, that presumes the Executive Branch does not prefer to have a pool of potentially removable and therefore vulnerable immigrants as a labor supply. But ferreting out and combating this tendency, we think, will be easier if the Executive Branch's responsibilities are more clearly defined and subject to public scrutiny at the ex ante stage than at the enforcement stage.

authority may be less pressing. But our very point is that the Executive should have substitute tools at its disposal to adapt to circumstances.

This call for delegation thus feeds into one final point. The President's powers remain limited as compared to what can be accomplished by Congress. The President has significant control over our shadow immigration system, but he cannot confer legal status directly on unauthorized immigrants; only Congress can do that through a legalization program. It has become commonplace for defenders of the President's actions to emphasize this point as a way of underscoring that the President's actions have remained within his domain.<sup>305</sup> Within our framework, however, this point highlights the continued centrality of Congress's role. And yet, Congress has been a poor participant in the debate, in our view. Though the Senate in 2013 passed an astoundingly comprehensive bill that would have launched a legalization program, Congress has contributed to the deferred action debate largely through symbolic appropriations riders forbidding the President from implementing the initiatives and threats to defund the Department of Homeland Security—a form of debate that threatens the escalation of political conflict but offers no real hope for policy reform.

Some commentators seem to fear that congressional passivity is in fact the product of Presidential action in this sphere—that initiatives like DACA and DAPA have the effect of disabling Congress, or at least pushing it into an oppositional posture rather than a lawmaking one.<sup>306</sup> We are skeptical of this argument. Historically, politicians, advocates, and strategists have offered two diametrically opposed views about the relationship between executive and congressional action. Both of these have been apparent in nearly every discussion about immigration reform over the last decade, in the form of opposite strategies for how the President should prompt Congress to fix the immigration laws. Some advocates argue that the President should publicly grant relief to millions (or even declare a moratorium on deportation) in order to highlight the broken nature of the system and prompt Congress to act. Others argue, instead, that the President should do his best to enforce the law to the hilt in order to expose the harshness and futility of the formal rules and thereby create political pressure for legislative change.<sup>307</sup>

<sup>306</sup> This argument resembles claims by the likes of James Bradley Thayer about the impact of judicial supremacy on Congressional action, or the claim that robust judicial review absolves Congress of its obligations to conform its actions to the Constitution. In statutory interpretation, textualists similarly claim that a certain type of judicial interpretation—textualism as opposed to purposivism—will give Congress incentives to draft laws more responsibly and clearly, and by implication that purposivism promotes sloppy legislative work.

<sup>307</sup> For a collection of contexts in which actors use full compliance with the law to highlight what they see as failings in the formal rules, see DORIS KEARNS GOODWIN, THE BULLY PULPIT: THEODORE ROOSEVELT, WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT, AND THE GOLDEN AGE OF JOURNALISM 209–10 (2013) (discussing Roosevelt's strategy of using strict enforcement to generate support for legal change among elites); and Jessica Bulman-Pozen & David E. Pozen, Uncivil Obedience, 115 COLUM. L.

In immigration law, there is an especially important reason to be skeptical of the claim that robust executive action hobbles Congress, and it captures a central fact too often elided in criticisms of the President's actions. In other contexts where this positive-political-theory-style claim is common, the decisions made by Congress and some other institution (usually courts) are substitutes. Either courts determine the meaning of a statute or Congress does; either courts ensure that legislation hews to constitutional contours or Congress does. In our case, however, the actions at stake are emphatically not substitutes. The President did not legalize five million unauthorized migrants—a crucial distinction for several reasons. First, this reality calls into question the notion that the President's actions might undermine the likelihood of congressional action. Ultimately we will have to have action by Congress if these five million unauthorized migrants (not to mention the six million others who would not benefit from the relief initiatives) are to be provided true security of residence in the United States. Second, this distinction shows why the model of congressional-executive relations in immigration law is so important to understanding the current controversy. The President's actions are far from the last word; in many ways they are the first word.

Recent history ultimately suggests that Congress would not have acted on immigration, even if President Obama had not pursued his relief initiatives. The partisan nature of the current debate over deferred action dominates the dynamics of the relationship between the branches generally speaking, making it unlikely that continuation of the pre-DAPA and DACA status quo would have resulted in more meaningful cross-branch debate. But in looking to executive branch policy-making as an alternative to congressional stasis, we should not lose sight of what can be lost when the Executive become the primary engine of policy—not just the open and transparent decision-making more likely to come from a less disciplined but more multi-faceted congressional debate, but also the collaboration between Congress and the Executive that defines any legislative process.

To be clear, we do not mean to suggest that executive policymaking as a general matter is always just a second best option to congressional action. We hope the dynamic, iterative conception of the separation of powers and the importance of the enforcement power to shaping a regulatory domain over time that we have highlighted shine through as reasons to appreciate executive policy-making within a proper and healthy distribution of powers. But we also believe that, when the President must take bold action to address threats to the rule of law within the domain of enforcement, a more fundamental recalibration of political branch responsibilities may be necessary.

V. CONCLUSION

Presidential immigration law is ascendant. The dominant policymaking role long played by the President, combined with the twentieth-century rise of de facto delegation, destabilizes a simple principal-agent model of congressional-executive relations in the immigration arena. These developments have produced an immigration regime in which the President has significant responsibility for—not just power over—the rules for screening immigrants. In wielding its enforcement power, therefore, the Executive Branch has actually constructed the screening system over time as it has chosen how to put the INA's statutory framework into effect, a process that has entailed considerable executive policymaking dynamically related to but still separate from congressional policy. The separation of powers framework that emerges from this history is thus far from static. De facto delegation has not entailed a simple transfer of power from one branch to another; as we have documented here and in our 2009 work, the structure of modern immigration law has produced an iterative relationship between the branches in which Congress has played an important, if not dominant, role. Without both an awareness of and appreciation for these dynamics, the President's immigration enforcement power cannot be properly understood—let alone cabined.

The separation of powers framework we have uncovered is not just an institutional reality to be bemoaned. We believe there are reasons to accept, and even endorse, presidential policymaking through enforcement, perhaps especially in the immigration context. That does not mean, of course, that the President's (and the agencies') exercise of discretion should go entirely unchecked. But it does suggest that the constraint will not come, in most cases, from an inquiry into whether the substantive policy choices embodied in enforcement initiatives such as DACA and DAPA promote congressional priorities. In place of that sort of doomed Take Care Clause inquiry, enforcement policies should be evaluated for whether they make reasonable rule of law trade-offs and thereby advance the general purposes of the constitutional separation of powers—the constraint of government power.

Crucially, this inquiry requires that one attend as much to relationships of power within the branches as across them, as a growing body of scholarly work has come to appreciate with respect to the administrative state as a whole. Within this framework, we think it clear that the Obama relief initiatives are lawful. By using rules to centralize discretionary decisionmaking, DACA and DAPA both make visible the political and policy choices the Executive Branch has made while enhancing the consistency of the government's use of its coercive powers. Further, the initiatives tame the faceless prosecutor by imposing politically accountable constraints on the decisions of low-level officials. Critics have argued that the programs are dangerous because they permit the President to replace Congress's judgments with his own. In reality, however, the relief initiatives have enabled him to discipline the judgments of low-level enforcement officials, bringing order and discipline, along with his own substantive preferences, to an immigration enforcement regime in which the Executive has significant responsibility for the structure of screening. Advocates for the President's actions who tout the virtues of "individualized" prosecutorial discretion in this setting obscure the institutional reality of how that discretion has operated in immigration law, and they distract attention from the crucial benefits that flow from the way that DACA and DAPA actually centralize and limit discretionary judgments.

Presidential policymaking has always provoked political controversy, at least as much because of deep ideological disagreements over immigration policy as because of the perception it creates of an aggressive or boundless Executive. The fact that today's particular controversy over the Obama relief initiatives has vivid partisan overtones is not to say that limits on policymaking through enforcement do not exist, even when they do not appear visibly or clearly in the statutes that set the parameters for executive action. But those limits will be excruciatingly difficult to define without disabling legitimate and desirable executive action, given the inevitability of enforcement discretion and the values-based judgments that must attend it. The bright-line rules critics have offered may have the appeal of ease of application, but they constrain executive power in ways that are neither constitutionally required nor necessarily consistent with the goal of keeping executive power in check. The separation of powers ultimately amounts to a messy political contest, and the search for clear, lawyerly lines to draw around the powers of the branches, we have come to believe, is misguided. Even if the current lawsuit succeeds in scuttling the President's most recent initiatives, the imperatives of enforcement will not disappear, and any President will look to respond to those imperatives while pursuing his own objectives. We can only hope that he has the necessary freedom to structure the enforcement power in a way that serves the goals of accountability and constraint and that he faces public and congressional pressure to do precisely that.
